BENJAMIN HOLLADAY.

---

THAT section of our country which fifty years ago was known as the Great West, has been a very hot-bed of human energy. From among the dark forests and broad prairies of the leftward slope of the Mississippi Valley have mainly sprung the rugged and restless intellects which for the last two decades have been doing the solid work of the country. It could hardly be otherwise, considering the character of the sires from whom they sprang—men who, with an axe on one shoulder and a rifle on the other, had started out in solitary state to hew an empire out of a wilderness, and conquer a race of savages while doing it. There were giants in those days, and there are giants in these; and the latter are sons of the former.

It was there—in the Valley of the Mississippi—that BENJAMIN HOLLADAY first saw the light, in (we believe) 1822. It was there, on the "dark and bloody ground" of Kentucky, that was laid, as it were, the foundation of a life of chance and change in phase, but of steady constancy in purpose. Of Mr. Holladay's childhood it is unnecessary to speak in detail. The probability is, so far as we have been able to discern it, that as a boy Mr. Holladay was, as the phrase goes, a "success." That is, he did not die. Early in life he emigrated to Western Missouri and engaged in traffic. Here he began laying the first courses of that magnificent structure—his commercial reputation. He soon became widely known as one of the shrewdest, boldest and most trustworthy of the "men of honest activities" who wrought out civilization in the Southwest.

When driven by persecutions which were a disgrace to Christianity, the Mormons sought security in the great deserts of the unknown West, Mr. Holladay loaded a wagon-train with goods and followed them, "that he might do them good"—and make an honest profit in the deed. He established a mercantile house at Salt Lake City in 1851, and conducted its rather meagre affairs until '53. Of course a mind like his found little scope in the dull eventless round of merchandising in a desert town, and he turned his attention to enterprises of greater "pith and moment." He secured contracts for supplying the different military posts with various quartermaster and subsistence stores, and soon acquired an ample fortune. Everything to which he turned his dextrous hand seemed to blossom and bear fruit.

Salt Lake City, about this time, swarmed with worn and weary "pilgrims" on their way to the gold country. Also, troops of Mormons were arriving at their promised land, after fatiguing journeys across hundreds of miles of the "sage-brush country." Holladay saw in this another source of profit; he bought their jaded animals, recruited them, and sent them by easy stages to California, where they commanded high prices. Arriving here, Mr. Holladay made contracts with William H. Aspinwall, of New York, for supplying the Pacific Mail steamers with provisions; and from this connection sprang an enduring friendship between these men, founded upon mutual admiration and esteem.

We pause here to note one fact, which speaks volumes for Mr. Holladay's sterling integrity of character. He has succeeded to a remarkable degree in not only impressing all good men with whom he has had business relations with an unbounded respect for his commercial and financial sagacity, but he has always inspired them with a peculiar friendly regard, which, wherever circumstances have permitted, has invariably grown into warm personal friendship. The writer of this sketch first visited Salt Lake City in '66, and he was struck with the prominence of the name of "Ben. Holladay" in the conversation of people of all classes, and no less impressed with the singular tenderness and warmth of feeling with which it was usually spoken. What will appear most remarkable to those familiar with the antagonisms of society at Salt Lake, is the fact that Mr. Holladay is equally popular with Mormon and Gentile. With regard to one who has taken so active a part in the affairs of both, this feeling is unhappily most exceptional.

At a date which has for the present escaped our memory, Mr. Holladay purchased from Mr. Aspinwall his northern coast steamers, and the line was managed by Mr. Flint, who was afterward lost on the ill-fated Golden Gate when she was burned at sea off the Mexican coast, in '58. This northern coast line has now expanded into the North Pacific Transportation Company, with steamers running to Oregon and Victoria northward, and southward to San Diego. There is also a monthly service between San Francisco, and Mazatlan and Guaymas, Mexico, connected with the new and important line established by Messrs. Holladay and Webb to Honolulu and Australia. It is quite unnecessary to dwell upon particulars regarding these steamship lines. Except the Pacific Mail, they are the only ones carrying the American flag to foreign ports. Congress having driven the steam carrying trade of the Atlantic into foreign bottoms, it is particularly gratifying to residents of the western coast to see these noble lines struggling against the adversities of suicidal legislation for the commercial empire of the Pacific. To such men as Ben. Holladay the nation owes a deep debt of gratitude for the tenacity with which they have clung to what in many cases have proven losing enterprises, in the vain hope of final recognition and encouragement.*

*The establishment of the Pony Express was considered as the beginning of a new epoch for California. It reduced the time between New York and San Francisco from twenty-two to thirteen days for letters, and made serious changes in business. In those days we imported far more and exported less, except of gold, than at present, and we were dependent on New York to a much greater degree, so that the time of communication with that city was a matter of the utmost importance. The steamers usually carried their passengers through between San Francisco and New York in twenty-two days, but occasionally made the trip in twenty. The Overland stage route took about the same time. The Pony Express line was started in April, 1860. On the 13th of that month the people of San Francisco were delighted to find in their morning papers telegrams from Genoa at the eastern base of the Sierra, announcing the arrival of the first mail pony there with news from St. Josephs, Missouri, to April 3d—twelve days later than previous advices. The new mail route was a subject of universal congratulation throughout the day. That evening notices were read in the theaters that the pony would arrive at one o'clock in the morning by the Sacramento boat, and that he would be received by a procession and music. The streets were full of people who went out to see the fun and share the excitement. Bonfires were lighted, the Monumental fire bell (a prominent feature of San Francisco in those days, but now superseded by the electric fire

Everybody in California has heard of the wonderful Pony Express, by which, long before the stage-coach era, the isolated mining population of this coast was put in a communication with the East almost as secure and rapid as is furnished by the great overland railroad of the present. By means of convenient relays of the tireless ponies, whose gravest gait was a wild gallop, letters were passed back and forth between the outposts of civilization on the Missouri, and those on the Sacramento, over thousands alarm) rang out its sharp summons to everybody to turn out. A large brass band played in Montgomery street at intervals till midnight, and then marched down to the wharf, followed by a large number of citizens, including the Volunteer Fire Department in red shirts with their engines and torches. At one o'clock the Antelope arrived, and the mail rider and his pony were no doubt astonished to see the wharf alive with people, brilliant with torches and resonant with music. When the pony walked across the gang plank, nine tremendous cheers were given, and the mail rider was warmly congratulated by a number of citizens on his arrival. The procession marched up through Montgomery street with brass music, singing and cheers. The people of the State felt as if they had been brought ten days nearer to the world by the pony. The western end of the pony route proper was at Sacramento, and when the first mail rider at this end of the line brought his horse to San Francisco, he did it not for the convenience of carrying the mail, but to advertise the line, and gratify the popular demand for an occasion to make a public demonstration. The mail between Sacramento and San Francisco was carried by boat, and sometimes it was carried between Folsom and Sacramento by rail, but between the last two points the distance was only twenty miles, and the cars seldom started at the time when the pony arrived. The length of the pony line from St. Josephs, Missouri, by way of Salt Lake to Sacramento, was about 1,900 miles, and seventy-five horses were used in going each way, each going twenty-five miles, at an average speed of 7 miles an hour day and night, including all stoppages. On the favorable ground the speed was ten or twelve miles an hour. The first pony left St. Josephs at 6:30 p.m. on the 3d of April; Salt Lake City, April 9th, at 6:30 p.m.; Carson, April 12th, at 2:30 p.m.; Placerville, April 13th, at 2 p.m.; and Sacramento, April 13th, at 5:00 p.m. Two mails were sent off every week each way. In May, 1860, one hundred letters were received at the San Francisco and Sacramento offices, and in December, 387; in May, 564 were sent from those two offices, and in December, 1,062, showing a rapid increase. The number of letters may appear small, but the postage from San Francisco to any point beyond Salt Lake was $5 for half an ounce. The success of the pony route, and its strong influence in business, furnished an additional proof of the importance of having quicker communication across the continent, so in the summer of 1860 preparations were made for erecting a telegraphic line. Early the next year work was commenced very industriously, and on the 24th of October, 1861, the first through telegram was received. As the line advanced, the importance and value of the Pony Express decreased, and by the middle of 1861 the pony mail ceased to possess much interest, as it had been long anticipated by the telegraph. The pony mail was a great institution in its time. Good luck, however, appears persistently to attach itself to the Holladay house in everything that they touched. Some few years ago an English Company opened a new mine on Sugar Pine Creek in Tuolumne County. This vein is about eight miles west of the town of Sonora, and the creek joins the famous Wood's Creek at that town. The mine was called "The Confidence Mine." Becoming disappointed at the end of two or three years, they abandoned the works, which were resumed from time to time by one or two other companies, and eventually sold for a comparatively trifling sum to Mr. Holladay, upon the earnest representation of a well-known mining engineer that the venture was more than a mere speculation. The result has proved the justice of the scientific observation. If rumor tells true, this mine brings in monthly a net return of more than double the purchase money, and promises from recent developments large returns for a long time to come, say two per cent. per month on a valuation of $1,000,000.—[EDITOR CALIFORNIA MAIL BAG.]

of miles of inhospitable desert, in the astonishingly brief space of one week. The conception of this idea and its execution are due to Mr. Holladay, whose teeming brain is ever prolific of novel and expeditious methods of intercommunication. He is a born common-carrier. The popularity of the Pony Express was unbounded, and its profits were proportionate. Though the original route has long been a thing of the past (it was established in 1855), the system is this day a marked feature of the civilization of the Interior, where steam has not yet been harnessed to its coach.

In 1862, having obtained favorable contracts for carrying the mails, Mr. Holladay organized his celebrated overland stage lines through Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, Colorado, Utah, Nevada and California, and the Pony Express having fulfilled its mission, expired in the arms of the new enterprise. This marked another epoch of Western civilization, and though the great railroad began immediately to shorten the stage route at either end, it was not without its fruits. For six years its countless coaches were crowded with passengers, the country began to be familiar with the great central plains of the continent and their hitherto unsuspected resources, and thriving settlements began to spring up along the route. And thus was rugged nature graded for the iron rail. In 1868, just before the completion of the transcontinental railroad, Mr. Holladay sold out his entire interest in the overland mail, stock and stations, to Wells, Fargo & Co., and the stage-coach era was soon closed forever.

Ever restless, energetic, bold and indefatigable, Mr. Holladay had now been identified with the vital enterprises of the Pacific coast for seventeen years. He had prospered wherever he had wrought; whatever work had come to his hand had seemed to bring a blessing with it, both to himself and to the country. While reverses were not wholly unknown, failure had stood widely aloof. He had not only amassed a princely fortune, but he had crowned himself with a reputation such as ought to fully satisfy the aspiration of any private citizen. He had come to be regarded as the representative man of his class—a class which, in grasp of intellect, keenness of foresight, boldness of conception and tenacity of purpose, has never been equaled in the commercial history of the world. The men who have made California and the Pacific cities—whose daring schemes have been the wonder and the life of the country—who have wrestled with the Angel of Fortune and compelled a blessing upon the land—may almost be counted upon the fingers, and conspicuous among them is Ben. Holladay. Having now passed the meridian of life, and acquired everything for which he had striven, it might have been expected that he would doff his casque and cuirass, lay aside the sword, and lounge at full length upon his laurels. But for such spirits as his there is no rest while the world is still incomplete. Like the witches' rat, "they'll do, and they'll do, and they'll do!" With these men, labor is its own end and reward; wealth and fame merely accessories. It is doubtful if even they have the benefit or well-being of their race very much at heart; the advantages derived from their activity is rather incidental than intended. In war they would be leaders of forlorn hopes, in politics dangerous and unscrupulous leaders. Upon the high seas, were it not that honest commerce is less dull and wearisome than robbery, it is to be feared that they would be pirates. Action and excitement is their food and drink; and it is because commerce, trade and the industries furnish these that they engage in them. It would be all the same if they furnished nothing else. Leland Stanford would build a railroad to the moon

if it were but difficult and feasible, and if Ben. Holladay could find nothing else for his hand to do, he would lay on a line of steamers to the Antarctic continent. These men are invaluable; if their activity and energy ministered only to their own needs, there would be nobody to minister to ours. And so it came that Mr. Holladay, instead of retiring, as you, reader, or we, writer, would have done, utilized his temporary leisure in projecting other and greater enterprises.

Turning his eye to Oregon, he quickly perceived in her need of railroads his opportunity. He soon secured the control of a charter to build and operate a road from Portland to the southern boundary of the State, to connect it eventually with California. This was called the Oregon Central, and the organization was legally imperfect. Mr. Holladay soon corrected all, and organized the Oregon and California Railroad, receiving from Government the enormous grant of 12,800 acres of land per mile. Since then he has devoted his mighty energies to its construction and equipment. The bonds, guaranteed by the land grants, and "floated" by the obviously advantageous nature of the enterprise, have been a favorite security with Eastern and European—particularly German—capitalists, and the corporation is one of the soundest and most healthy in the United States.

To dispose of the valuable land grants in the Willamette Valley, 130 miles long and 30 broad, and stretching away into the rich, rolling valley of the Umpqua; thence to the Rogue River country and the southern boundary of the State, he has organized a gigantic Land Company, and dispatched agents to all the principal cities of Europe to induce immigration and settlement upon the most advantageous terms ever offered by any similar concern. The benefit to the State will be almost incalculable. In a few years these rich agricultural districts will teem with the most frugal, industrious and intelligent population in the world. A gentleman, who represents the interests of the European stockholders, has just made a thorough personal investigation and inspection of the affairs of the company, and has expressed himself greatly impressed with the spirit, energy and integrity of its management, which from the first has been confided almost exclusively to Mr. Holladay's discretion.

Upon the completion of this enterprise, what further schemes will engage the attention of this tireless projector it is impossible to foresee; but his past record is ample warrant for the belief that in whatever direction he may cast his lines, they will fall in pleasant places, and—if we may slightly vary our metaphor—when they are reeled in there will be found a particularly fat fish upon the end of each.

WINE AND VINEYARDS.

We purposely place the manufactured article in advance of the staple commodity, because the importance of the trade entirely depends upon that former product. As an edible fruit, the grape is now of little importance to the wealth of the State. California has, with her usual vigor, sprung up to a prominent place among the wine producing countries of the world, and that spite of many obstacles. In the days when grapes were a dollar a bunch, and even twenty-five cents a pound, it paid the grower much better to ship his crop from Los Angeles, and sell it in this market. A change came, other fruits were brought into competition, the vineyards increased, and it became a question what to do with the surplus of the crop. Of course the answer was, it must be made into wine. Hence arose the fallacy that he who could plant the vine and gather the grapes could also tread the wine-press and manufacture the wine; further still, not only manufacture, but bring it to market. In other words, the happy, contented, not over wealthy husbandman of Los Angeles, found himself transformed by the force of circumstances into grower, manufacturer and merchant, with a limited capital and still more limited knowledge, either of manipulation or business. The good man tasted his grapes as they ripened in the genial sun of the South, pronounced them very good, forthwith bought what he considered the necessary utensils, and made his wine. He was ignorant of the fact that in all branches of industry, when the grower undertakes to manufacture, he generally fails. A tanner cannot at the same time be a shoemaker (such was unsuccessfully tried in this very State) any more than a farmer or a miller should be a baker, and it has ever been found that the division of each calling under separate heads is more conducive to the prosperity of a State than their union under one. Private individuals can always successfully compete with Government undertakings, unless such are protected by legislative enactments. The consequence of this conglomeration of pursuits, joined to want of skill, caused the early wines of California to be crude, alcoholic and unpalatable. The grower waited a reasonable time, until fermentation had, as he thought, done its work, and then bunged up his wine in cask, and placed it either in a cellar where a thorough draft constantly passed through, or in a wooden shed where it was roasted all day and frozen all night. If the wine didn't go sour or fermentation didn't set in again, or the whole affair didn't turn to a cask of rosy insipidity, the fortunate grower was left with a liquid that "must be pure," for it was made from the juice of the grape, and nothing else, but which, as above stated, was crude, alcoholic and unpalatable. Vine-growing requires a multiplicity of information. First of all, and one of the most important, is an analytical knowledge of the soil and its adaptability to grape culture. Again, it is necessary to know what grape is most fitted to such a soil, for although vines will thrive anywhere in California, yet certain species are better suited for certain conditions than others, and vice versa. The Mission grape, as it is popularly called, was brought into this country (as we have been told by everybody who has mentioned the subject) by the old padres. It has been generally called, also, the Malaga grape, but Mr. Keller, of Los Angeles, than whom few men are more capable of judging, believes that, from the fact of these early fathers having come mainly from Catalonia, the vines that were sent to them were ordered from their native province, and that the Mission is the Catalan grape, the same that now makes the Spanish wine called Beni Carlo. Moreover, says the same well-informed gentleman, the voyage in those days was very long and tedious, and had many species of vines been sent out by the Spaniards to their distant brethren, only the most hardy cuttings would survive the voyage. Now this Catalan or Mission grape is particularly hardy, and on the Darwinian scheme must predominate. To return: The old Mission grape was grateful to the taste, sweet and saccharine, planted as it was on the low bottom lands of the valleys. Take the same vine to the foothills and plant it on a calcareous earth, where it struggles for existence among rocks and stones, and you have a grape less palatable, but more fitted to make a wholesome wine than its pampered brother of the lowlands. This latter may make a stronger spirit, but the other has drawn its life more from the mountain air and the stony soil, and is not of the earth earthy. Now there is an indigenous wild grape that grows in California. It is to be found in the shelter of ravines, winding around the bushes that surround them, generally about some spring that forms a little pool among the rocks, which it covers with its cool green shade. If undisturbed, hundreds of quail congregate at these spots toward sunset. This grape is acrid and very small, yet it has been advantageously used in the making of wine. M. Covillaud, of Marysville, who was a practical wine maker, mixed half of the wild grape with an equal portion of cultivated, and produced a wine somewhat similar to those of the Rhone in France, with the exception of its being of a higher body, but the bouquet and flavor were superior to that of most Californian wines.

As long as the Southern part of the State, more particularly Los Angeles and its vicinity, was the wine producing portion, we were obliged to put up with the straw-colored, earthy-flavored alcoholic wine that was supplied. The consequence was that a new class of manufacturers sprang up, who may be classed as mixers, reducers, flavorers, improvers, or any other name that signifies changing the original article so as to render it palatable. By this class, and out of the large pipes of the raw Los Angeles wine, were produced neat packages of California Port, Sherry and Madeira; also, pretty cases containing bottles labeled Angelica, and other names copied from the various brands of the wines of Cincinnati and elsewhere.

We speak merely of the wines of commerce, without reference to those in private cellars, for it is well known that the pioneer settlers had old and carefully made wines stored away, which they would produce on festive and hospitable occasions. Wilson, of St. Luis Obispo, the genuine Cucamongo, wine that resembled good Marsala in color and taste, and lighter wines savoring more of the Moselle than the Rhine, the Gerke, for example, from Chico; these were to be found, but they did not form part of the general trade of the State. In the early days, that is, from 1850 to 1860, California wine, like the prophets of old, found little honor in its own country. It was tabooed at San Francisco tables, and only consumed in the interior, in consequence of the adulterated nature of the whisky and brandy supplied by the San Francisco jobbers. Travelers fondly thought that in drinking California wine they at least could not hurt their insides, however insipid or sour the beverage might be.

A change, however, ensued. The owners of land in the coast range valleys turned their attention to vine growing. As early as 1832 the land where now flourishes the Buena Vista Vinicultural Society was planted with vines and a household wine made from the grapes. General Vallejo likewise made wine earlier than that date, but it was not until the farmers seriously set to work to make money out of their vineyards that Napa and Sonoma valleys may be said to have come into the market with their grape produce. Col. Haraszthy went to Europe. His bean ideal at that time was Hungarian wine, the wine, as some one has termed it, a very Janus of savor, sweet to the first taste and bitter in the second, or precisely the opposite, with an astringent first sip and a cloying memory. The grape thrived here, but the soil was not suited to it for wine purposes. The fruit is giant in size, but wastes in volume under the press. So Haraszthy went to France and Germany, and picked out the best vines. He chose the Chasselas and the Black Hamburg for the use of the table as fruit, but discarded them for the purpose of wine-making, choosing other varieties, of names well known in Europe, such as the small Tokay, etc., for the Californian vineyards. Now it takes four years after planting before the vine-cuttings bear fruit, or rather should be allowed to bear fruit, because prior to that time all grapes should be carefully removed, in order to give strength to the parent stem for future bearing. Sonoma was the first in the field as an opponent in the manufactured article to Los Angeles. In 1856 vineyards dotted the whole of the beautiful valley. Sonoma rapidly increased as a wine producing district. In 1869 the yield was greater than that of the Los Angeles district, and this year, unless an unforeseen calamity intervenes, the vintage will be superior in quantity, and especially in quality, to any preceding years. The drought, so fatal to the wheat crop, is especially favorable to the vine. The grape has more saccharine and less of watery matter than in wetter years, and although, perhaps, in a mere commercial point of view the weight is less, which to a certain extent is a loss to the growers, yet the wine makers gain by the stronger juice that flows from their presses. That which we have said with respect to Sonoma applies equally to Napa. The farmers of Napa Valley, with their broad rich bottom lands, kept longer to the cultivation of cereals, and it was not until the extensive operations of Mr. Groesinger opened their eyes to the advantages to be obtained by combining grape with wheat culture, that they began to turn their attention to their vineyards. Still, Napa is far behind Sonoma valley in production. Meanwhile it had been found that El Dorado county was peculiarly adapted for the cultivation of grape vines, and that the foothills of the Sierras produced even better grapes than those of the coast range. No better wine comes into our market than that from the manufacturers of that county, and a species of grape called the Black Burgundy finds particular favor there. Tuolumne county likewise has sent some superior California Wine into the market, especially a very rich red wine somewhat resembling that which is called "foundation port" in the London market, such wine being used as a strengthener and fortifier of old and worn out red wines (in the same way as applied to old and worn out humanity). The quantity of this last wine, however, is limited. Los Angeles during this time had not been idle. A large German company had founded the Anaheim Vineyard, had imported the vines from Germany that make the famous Rhine wines, such as the Foster Riesling, the Assmanshauser (which, by the way, originally came from the Rhone), and the many varieties, both red and white, so carefully cultivated in Rhineland. From the Moselle they obtained the varieties of the highly flavored Muscatel and the Anaheim Vineyard, based upon a thorough co-operative system, has gone on flourishing since its foundation in 1867, although active operation can hardly be said to have commenced prior to the general division among the members in 1864. Some few years ago Mr. Keller, of Los Angeles, went to France for the purpose of obtaining cuttings of the most celebrated vines in the wine districts. He returned with some hundred varieties, and they have all thriven well under his management. Hitherto no single variety has borne enough fruit to make a separate wine, and the grapes have been all thrown together into the press. This year, however, the increase of bearing will enable him to make a distinct wine from several separate species, and thereby test the comparative merits of his wine with that made in France from the same variety, as, for example, whether the pure Medoc grape will make what we call Claret. That will make this a memorable year in the annals of California wine-making, especially as the vintage promises to be the largest and the best we have ever yet had. The soil of Los Angeles is a light loam, mixed in some places with clay and gravel. That of Sonoma and Napa Valley is a rich alluvial soil in the bottom lands, well adapted for raising eating grapes, whilst that of the favored spots on the hill sides is a red decomposed sandstone mixed with clay and gravel. In other parts of the State, an excellent soil for vineyards is strongly intermixed with magnesia, lime or chalk, whilst the best for wine is the volcanic formation of the foothills of the Sierra Nevada. Puta Creek, in Solano county, sends us splendid eating grapes from the vineyards of the Wolfskills.

It was not to be expected that with such varied soils and climate the vine would flourish equally well, or bear uniformity of grape. The light, dry soil of Los Angeles requires irrigation, which is never good for the vineyard. It is the perennial rains, and, more than those, the dews of heaven, joined to a judicious manuring of the exhausted soil, that ensures the best quality of grape. The red soil of Sonoma and Napa valleys, whenever it crops out from the hill-sides, is eagerly covered to-day with vineyards, for it is that mixture of sandstone and iron which produces the best grape in that neighborhood. The diluvial, volcanic soil of the foot hills of the Sierra is especially adapted for vine growing, more particularly, as we before remarked, in El Dorado county, which is almost inclosed by mountains, and the hot, dry summer days bring forth all the strength of the grape.

The relative proportions of the wine product of Sonoma Valley, Napa Valley, Los Angeles and El Dorado, may be represented by the figures, 41, 38, 14 and 11. This calculation being based on the last official return, although relatively correct, cannot be entirely relied upon to-day, because El Dorado, having come later into the field, her grape-bearing vines have increased in greater proportion than her older competitors, in other words, more new vineyards have contributed their wines during the last two years from El Dorado and the other counties bordering on the Sierra Nevada than from those other three. We have not included the Sacramento Valley vineyards in our category, as, although their yield is as large as that of Napa, the grapes are chiefly sent to market for the supply of the dessert table, the easy communication with the large cities rendering such more profitable than wine making, and the nature of the soil being more adapted to that branch of culture.

We have been at some pains to ascertain approximately the probable yield of the principal vineyards and manufacturies for the coming vintage, and the following may be relied upon as not far from the truth: In Sonoma, the Buena Vista Vinecultural Society will make from 100,000 to 150,000 gallons; Mr. Stewart, 30,000; Craig, 25,000; Carrigar, 30,000; Major Snyder, 15,000; Dr. Warfield, 8,000; A. F. Haraszthy, from his own vineyard, 18,000; I. Landsberger & Co., from their vineyard, 16,000; Aquillan, who has leased the produce of the Vallejo's vineyards, 25,000; Gundlach, from 60,000 to 80,000; Tichners, 75,000; Winkel, 30,000; A. S. Edwards and Hood will each make 35,000, and other small growers will send to market 150,000 gallons. In Napa, Grozinger, who commands the trade of the valley, and whose large storehouse on the line of the rail is familiar to travelers to Calistoga, will make about 100,000 gallons; Brannan, who generally sells his vintage, 10,000; Krug, 20,000; Craue & Montgomery, 35,000; Wing, 10,000; Siegriest Brothers, 50,000; Pellet, 35,000; Fulton, 10,000; Woodward, 5,000; Dr. Lockwood, 10,000; and others, 75,000 gallons. Shell & Krause, of Knight's Ferry, 30,000, and West Brothers, of Stockton, 20,000 gallons; other growers, 60,000 gallons. The majority of the grapes of this latter house, drawn as they are from the San Joaquin Valley, are sold for table use. Bugbey, of El Dorado, will make 160,000; the Orleans Hill Vine Co., 100,000; Eberhardt & Lachman, from purchased grapes, 80,000, and other growers, 50,000 gallons. Going South, the Anaheim Wine Growers' Association will make 100,000; Hammes, 15,000; Werder, 15,000; Korn, 20,000, and smaller vineyards, 250,000 gallons. In Los Angeles, M. Keller will make at least 150,000; B. D. Wilson, 100,000; Kohler, 80,000; Rose, 80,000, and other growers, 300,000 gallons. We have beyond a doubt omitted many names that will produce largely this season, and may also have been in error in some of our calculations. In either case we shall be happy to correct our mistake in our next number, as well as refer to it in the columns of the News Letter. The Anaheim crop may be overstated, as the grasshopper has committed some ravages among the vines in that district, but in the other quotations we are rather under than above the mark. The only house in California for native wines is that of I. Landsberger & Co. Their manufacturing capacity is 1,200 cases a month, divided as follows: Dry wine, 400 cases; private cuvee, 650 cases, and muscatel, 150. This house has made great progress in the quality of its wines, and to-day turns out a light, highly flavored champagne, that is much esteemed by judges. Their muscatel wine has attained great favor, and this house pins its reputation on that brand. A well-known connoisseur of Louisiana (Mr. Marshall) wrote as follows: "If this wine is not crowded on the market, but left to gain favor by its own merits, it will take first rank, not only among native wines, but among the wines of the world." Notwithstanding their present production is equal, in pints and quarts, to 1,800 dozen a month, they contemplate enlarging their capacity to 2,000 monthly. We may estimate the quantity of brandy manufactured in this State as one-twentieth of the quantity of wine, and at the same time note a material improvement in the quality of this latter article. On the whole, we may estimate that the ensuing vintage will nearly touch eight million gallons. The last year gave us nearly six millions, and from the fact of a very heavy yield, coupled to many young vines bearing for the first time this year, we may safely add twenty-five per cent. to last year's product. We congratulate the vine growers at the cheerful prospect they have for 1871, and shall return to the subject next month.

RESOURCES OF THE NORTHWEST.

Puget Sound, on the borders of which will be the future metropolis of the North Pacific Coast, is an inland sea, dotted with islands and joined to the Pacific by a gateway called the Straits of Fuca. 80 miles in length, 10 to 12 in width, and from 20 to 100 fathoms deep in all its parts. One arm of the Sound extends northward from where it joins the Strait, and the other southward: both divide and ramify, until the Sound, with all its bays and deep-water inlets, presents a shore line of 1,833 miles, and extends across two degrees of latitude. There is no obstruction at the entrance. The mouth of the Strait is easily entered in all weather. For 150 miles the mid channel is more than 300 feet deep, and remarkably free from all hidden dangers. On each side of the main channel, and in the various bays which will be the real harbors and shipping ports, the water is still deep, but not too deep for anchorage. The holding ground is excellent. The waters abound with fish of great variety and excellence. The cod banks of Alaska are now known to be as extensive and productive as those of our Atlantic coast. These fisheries are necessarily tributary to the trade of Puget Sound. Besides, the climate of Washington Territory offers for curing fish just the required medium of temperature—an average of 40 degrees in winter and 62 degrees in summer. The fisheries are 800 miles nearer the drying racks and the shipping ports of Puget Sound than to those of San Francisco. These advantages will govern the location of the fishing trade. The best whaling ground left to American harpooners is within eighteen days of the western terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad. The basin containing the Sound and its branches is bounded on the east by the Cascade Range of mountains, and sheltered on the west by the Olympian or Coast Range. This depression between the two mountain ridges is about 75 miles in width, and that part which is not occupied by the waters of the Sound is mainly covered with magnificent forests, which extend to the very summit of the mountains. Here grows that Puget Sound timber of which so much has been written—fir, cedar, pine, spruce, hemlock, oak, maple, cotton-wood, ash, dog-wood, alder and some of the smaller varieties. The forests of giant fir and cedar are traversed by ten rivers, which flow down from the Cascade Mountains and empty into the Sound, furnishing ten alluvial valleys of agricultural land, and supplying for logging purposes another thousand miles of inland shore-line. In connection with the remarkable climate in which twenty varieties of flowers are known to be in bloom at the beginning of January, the productive capacity of the soil of the Puget Sound region is great, both as to quantity and quality. Puget Sound is no exception to the wheat yield of the Pacific slope. All the other cereals are grown to perfection: oats are particularly plump and heavy. The small grains are at home in Washington Territory. Pork is usually fattened upon peas, wheat and barley, and, it is claimed, can be made as cheaply as upon corn in the Western States. Fruits of all kinds, except the peach and the grape, are raised in great profusion. Oregon and Washington apples are exported to San Francisco. Potatoes and other vegetables, grown on the north coast, are also in high favor in the San Francisco market. The turnip yield will be most abundant.

CULTURE OF THE OLIVE.--OLIVE OIL.

That the Olive thrives in California and yields abundantly is a fixed fact. Introduced by the Spanish priests in early days it became a favorite at their missions, both as an ornamental shade tree, as well as supplying them with its fruit, and oil for illuminating their churches and dwellings. It is with its culture for commercial purposes, however, we would treat, as it is attended with great profit at but little outlay, and is one of the most reliable of crops. In the southern provinces of Italy, Bari and Laterra d'Otranta, it flourishes in its greatest luxuriance, and it is from such practical orchardists as are found there that we should gather our information. They succeed in getting bearing trees in two years, and full-bearing trees in five years, and the profits they realize exceed those of their competitors in Palestine, Syria, Greece, and the south of Spain and France. In the latter country much poppy-seed oil is sold, and finds its way into foreign markets as second quality olive oil. The olive tree is similar in appearance to the willow, and is of extraordinary longevity and hardiness. At Pescio one is known to be upwards of six hundred years old; another, three hundred and fifty years old, lately yielded no less than sixty gallons, although the trunk was entirely hollow. A hundred years is its usual full bearing lifetime, and it is to be observed that the yield increases for twenty years of its growth, and never decreases after. At six years the olive tree should produce from eleven to fourteen gallons of fruit, and this, properly manipulated, yields a gallon of first quality oil, and a gallon to a gallon and a half of second quality, of a value of from $7 to $10 per tree. The Italian methods of collecting the crops vary; some allow it to ripen and fall, but this decreases the yield of oil; others gather it before it is ripe, but this deteriorates from its quality. To gather it by hand when it is just ripe is the best method, but as this is tedious, another plan has been adopted with great success: The fruit is shaken from the tree when ripe and caught in a cloth loosely stretched on a frame and placed beneath the tree. If the olives are quite ripe, the oil is at once extracted; if not they are allowed to lie for a day or two till they begin to wrinkle. They are first crushed in a circular bed by a single millstone, then placed in hair bags, and lightly squeezed in a screw press of rude construction, to obtain the first quality oil, which is run off, after being freed from water, into rock tanks, where it is left to clarify. The bags with the olives from which the first quality oil has been extracted are now immersed in hot water to coagulate albuminous matter, and when cool are again placed in the press and the balance of the oil expressed. This is termed second quality, and after standing for a considerable time the top portion is drawn off; the residue is termed third quality, and is principally used in the manufacture of Castile soap. The cost of producing the oil is about 12 per cent. of its value, but so simple and inexpensive is the process that even in this country from 20 to 25 per cent. would be an ample allowance for expenses. Oil should be clarified in stone, or in glazed earthenware vessels before being placed in casks or other wooden vessels. At Gallipoli the oil cisterns are hewn out of the solid rock.

In Santa Barbara valley Messrs. Fernald, Blanchard & Towle have 2,000 olive trees of six years growth which will this year probably net them from ten to twelve thousand dollars, and the product of the neighborhood is estimated at over 100,000 gallons. In Italy from 300 to 350 trees are planted to the acre, from 11 to 12 feet apart. In this country the fruit sells for seventy-five cents a quart, but the probability is the demand would be too limited for an extensive production. The oil, however, will always be one of the most remunerative articles which can be produced, either for home consumption or for export. It is to be observed that the olive tree cultivated for oil is of a species producing a smaller fruit, whilst those of Spain produce a larger fruit for consumption and from which a much smaller quantity of oil is obtainable. These latter are seldom of the same size and height as the former. Around the amphitheatre of hills at the back of Mentone a perfect forest of the oil-producing trees form one of the most striking features of the landscape.

THE MILLS SEMINARY.*[For Engraving, See Opposite Page.]

Civilization is the test of intellectual development: it is the touchstone of its quality, the evidence of its progress, and in the same ratio as the latter is fostered will the former advance. The generally received maxim that a newly peopled country tends but little to encourage mental culture is negated by our experiences in California. In no State or country, of whatever growth, have greater facilities for the encouragement of the mental culture of youth been offered than here. Our public schools are sufficient proof of this. Their condition is a conclusive commentary upon the energetic action of our citizens in promoting the great cause of education in our midst, and is to us, justly, a source of honest pride. But whilst the means for public instruction for the masses have been thus extended and perfected in so signal a manner, the high character and greater advantages afforded by private educational establishments have even at an early stage in our political existence commanded our admiration. First among these stands preëminently the MILLS SEMINARY, an institute which, whether considered in reference to the admirably arranged course of study, its internal economy, its home-like character, its lovely situation, the completeness of every detail, the size and elegance of the building, or the high standing and ability of the principals and their competent staff of professors and assistants, has no superior, if any equal, in the United States.

In presenting to our readers a somewhat detailed account of Mills Seminary, we may premise that a personal inspection of many of the private schools of Europe, including some of those of the highest class in England, in France and in Germany, compels us to acknowledge that we have never yet met with one combining so many advantages, both mental, physical and moral, as does the one which is the subject of this notice. In 1852, the Seminary for young ladies was established at Benicia and placed in the hands of Trustees. The objections which are inseparable from a divided authority was soon apparent to many, and two years afterwards it was transferred to Miss Mary Atkins, who purchasing it became sole proprietress and directress. Under her management the school soon obtained the character it has ever since maintained—that of the best seminary in the State. After conducting the Benicia Institute for eleven years with the most remarkable and continued success, Miss Atkins disposed of it to the Rev. Dr. C. T. Mills, under whose charge, and that of his wife, it has since been. Dr. Mills is a gentleman of very lengthened experience in tuition, an enthusiast in his occupation, and a man of varied and high attainments. His administrative talent is no less remarkable, and to it is added an affectionate and fatherly manner, which wins for him the warmest regard of his pupils, who in consequence strive to merit his approbation in the pursuit of their studies. It is easy therefore to understand how the popularity of the Seminary increased, until the patronage bestowed upon it soon rendered its removal to more eligible premises a matter of necessity. Possessing a tract of land in the neighborhood of Fruitvale, Alameda county, Dr. Mills, after due consideration, determined to erect there an institute second to none in the United States, and which, bearing his name, should remain a monument to his labors in the cause of education. In the Mills Seminary he has faithfully carried out his purpose. The cost of the land, buildings, furniture, and other improvements, exceed $100,000; of this sum, the Doctor himself supplied upwards of $60,000, and more than $30,000 has been contributed, in sums varying from $1,500 to $100, by liberal and public spirited gentlemen of San Francisco, Alameda and the adjoining neighborhoods. Their contributions are free gifts, conferring on the donors no voice in the design, erection, or in the conduct of the Seminary, but freely donated to enable Dr. Mills to carry out his noble purpose. Nothing could give a greater proof of the high estimation in which the character of the Doctor is held, and of the confidence felt in his ability to complete that which he proposed. In the canvassing for these subscriptions, not only the Doctor, but the people of the State at large, owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. J. O. Eldridge, one of the very largest contributors, who, in a whole-souled manner, directed his well-known energy to the attainment of the object.

No better locality than that selected for the erection of the Seminary could have been found in California. It is picturesque in the extreme, healthy, retired, and yet easily accessible; being about five miles from Oakland, and only one mile from the Seminary Park station, on the Alameda Railroad. Leaving the Seminary station, a broad avenue, planted on either side with poplar trees, leads towards the Mills Seminary, which lies in a delightful nook resting at the base of the foothills, surrounded by fine oaks, sycamore, laurel, alder and willow trees. Two running streams meander through the grounds, which comprise sixty-five acres. Over one of these the visitor crosses on a substantial bridge, and passing under and close to the magnificent oaks, the facade of the edifice meets the eye. It is of three stories, with a mansard roof, and is at once imposing and tasteful, conveying an idea of spaciousness and comfort fully confirmed by internal inspection. The aspect of the front is southerly, and it is sheltered on the north by hills, wending round to the westward. The length is 218 feet, with a depth of 75 feet, the eastern wing having a depth of 130 feet, with 55 feet of frontage. It is intended to add to the length of the corresponding wing hereafter. The center and wings project slightly, thus relieving the monotonous appearance of continuous length and adding to the airiness and comfort of the interior. The center is surmounted by a cupola, in which a fine telescope is to be mounted, commanding a magnificent view of San Francisco Bay, the San Bruno Hills in the distance, with the towns of San Leandro and Alameda in the foreground. To the left of the Seminary, at some distance, is the Gas House, whence gas is supplied to the whole establishment, there being not less than 350 burners in the various apartments. Fronting the house, beyond the lawn, is an orchard and grapery, producing some of the choicest varieties of fruit in the State, and formerly cultivated by Mr. Saillot. It is Dr. Mills' purpose to greatly extend the size of this vineyard so as to have ample supplies of healthy fruit for his pupils. There are three front entrances; that in the center leading to suites of reception rooms, furnished in elegant style, with frescoed ceilings and walls—that on the right to the Principal's private apartments, and that on the left to the studies, lecture and music rooms. Entering by this last you are at once struck by the spaciousness, airiness and cheerful aspect of the interior. Passing an office for the Principal, we enter a music room, adjoining which is the private room of the Professor of the art—an elegant little apartment, beautifully frescoed and decorated. Passing through this, we enter the large Hall, used for various purposes, with raised platform and windows at both ends. This opens into a fine schoolroom for juniors, with desks and other appurtenances of the most approved kind. Adjoining this are several recitation rooms. The blackboards are throughout of patent slate cloth—a great improvement upon the chalk-boards generally in use. In the immediate vicinity are various other accommodations for the pupils, of the most complete and convenient design, as wash rooms, etc. A corridor from the main building leads to the dining-room, a lofty apartment, 70 feet long and 36 wide; and in close proximity is the kitchen, with extensive ranges and hot-air ovens of large size, capable of baking 80 loaves at a time.

In the main building, three wide staircases lead to the second story, and a like number to the third story. On these are situated the bedrooms of the pupils and their teachers. These are of uniform furniture, neatly varnished bedstead, with spring-mattress, bureau, table, bookshelves and chairs; a washing-closet adjoins every room, with fixed wash-bowl, hydrant, etc. The bedrooms are carpeted throughout, and furnished with inside blinds and gas jets. The assistant teachers' apartments are situated at various points on the floors, so as to be always accessible to their pupils in any case when their advice or assistance may be desirable. Adjoining the Principal's private apartments in the right wing of the house, are rooms set apart in case of sickness, to which the invalids can be removed, and close under the eye of Mrs. Mills. There are numerous bath-rooms and other conveniences, with water tanks on the top of the building for the supply of all the bedrooms and the bath-rooms, and also as a security against fire. For further protection in this case, there are numerous fire extinguishers of the most approved description. The great width of the halls and the separate stairways are excellent features. In any case of sudden alarm, ample means of egress is thus afforded. The entire building is a model, indeed, of convenience and comfort, with ample ventilation and light in every part. The architects were S. C. Bugbee & Son, and the Seminary reflects the greatest credit upon their taste in design, and their talent of arrangement. The whole of the rooms are warmed by hot air on the most approved method. In the rear of the building, and detached from it, a laundry and servants' rooms have been erected, and a gymnasium, 72 feet by 40, will shortly be completed, which will be furnished with suitable apparatus, affording every facility for calisthenic exercises. Dio Lewis' system of gymnastics is the one followed in the Seminary. The extensive grounds afford also ample accommodation for the physical training of the young ladies.

The Seminary is eminently Christian in character, but not sectarian, and a beautiful chapel, 100 feet by 45, will shortly be erected a few hundred yards from the school, with a pastor's study and lecture-room attached. There is also in progress of construction a reservoir, at an elevated point on the hill in the rear of the Seminary, so as to have a constant supply of water, brought from the creek at that point to the highest part of the building, without the necessity of pumping; and a swimming bath is also to be thus supplied continuously with fresh water.

Dr. and Mrs. Mills are aided in their labors by fifteen resident assistants, selected with special regard to their qualifications in their various departments, in addition to the visiting professors.

We have thus at some length described the most salient features of this noble Seminary, to which California may point as a prominent mark in her advancing history. On our visit during the present vacation, we saw many of the pupils visiting their new home, and it was pleasant indeed to observe the affectionate yet respectful manner with which they greeted their preceptors. Several other visitors were there, and we heard of one case where a gentleman from Chicago, in company with his daughter, was so pleased with his visit that he asked her how she would like to remain there to school. On her replying that she would, he at once placed her in the Seminary, and has returned home to send her sister to join her before school opens. The names of those gentlemen who have donated sums of money to carry out Dr. Mills' intentions we give below:

OUR CROP--OUR CONDITION--OUR PROSPECTS.

From Friedlander's Grain Circular, the standard authority on such matters on this coast, we make the following extract:

In addition to the above we have received from Oregon 43,194 centals of Wheat, 143 centals of Barley, 7,922 centals of Oats, and 180,558 barrels of Flour. It will be seen from the above, that our receipts of Wheat and Flour for 1870-71 show a falling off from those of 1869-70 of the equivalent of 1,900,000 centals of Wheat. This, however, by no means represents the actual loss to the State from the unfavorable character of the season through the great wheat-growing districts, for the increased acreage planted was so great, that had the season been even ordinarily propitious, the product of Wheat would have exceeded that of the previous year fully one-third. This would have nearly doubled our receipts for the past twelve months, and instead of a deficit of 1,900,000 centals, we would have shown a total receipt of nearly 10,000,000. We regret to say, that instead of making up this deficiency, the year we are now entering on will show a still greater falling off. The season has been one of the driest ever known in this State, and coming on the heels of a dry year, the effect on the farming interest has been most disastrous. It is estimated that something over a million of acres was planted this season in Wheat. Under favorable circumstances this would have produced over and above all our own requirements, a surplus for export of something like 600,000 tons; instead of which it is hardly probable that we will have much more than 100,000 to send abroad during the coming year. This succession of dry winters has been very hard upon our farmers, many of whom were recent immigrants, whose entire means had been exhausted in getting in crops which yielded no returns; but we are happy to state that, with the ingenuity and adaptability which so wonderfully characterize them, the farmers throughout the great interior valleys have already commenced to secure themselves against future contingencies of the same sort, by an entire change in their system of agriculture, and by the construction of large irrigating canals. The natural conformation of the country in the great valleys of the San Joaquin and Sacramento is such, and the amount of water in the streams so great, that nature seems to have lent herself completely to the work, and there can be no question, that, when once the facilities for irrigation are afforded, the fertility of the soil is such, the product of Wheat will be enormously increased, at the same time that the yield will be put beyond the pale of contingencies. These most important works are already under way, and a large district of country (most of which has never yielded a bushel of grain) will be planted under the new system during the coming season. It is believed that five years hence almost all the Wheat raised in the State will be produced in this manner.

Recurring to the above estimate of the amount of Wheat over and above our requirements that we will have for export during the coming twelve months, we would say, that while we believe it to be substantially correct, it is extremely difficult in a season like the present to arrive at anything like strictly accurate figures.

The crop yield throughout the State has varied from a total and absolute failure (as on the west bank of the San Joaquin River, where for thousands of acres planted not one head of grain was produced) to a yield far surpassing an average, such as is the case in Napa Valley, parts of Sonoma, the Pajaro, and Butte and Tehama counties. Assuming, however, that we will export 100,000 tons, and that an average price of two cents per pound will be obtained for it (which does not appear to be an extravagant figure considering the anomalous condition of affairs in Europe), our Wheat crop will furnish an exchange of $4,000,000. It is estimated that our clip of wool under the effect of an extraordinary high range of price will amount to $10,000,000. Our wine, fruit, nuts, etc., will hardly yield less than an additional $2,000,000, so that the entire result of the labors of our farmers of all classes will foot up not far from $15,000,000, which our friends abroad will, we think, admit is an extraordinary showing for a State with a population of hardly half a million of souls—particularly in a second season of almost unparalleled drought. That a good deal of distress prevails among our farming population is most true, but the reason of it is obvious. Up to November, 1869, no class of working men in the world were in better position than our Agriculturalists. They had had quite a succession of favorable seasons; they had realized good prices for their farm products of every description; and they were not only free of debt, but had a large aggregate of realized capital in hard coin in bank. It looked as if farming in California was one of the most profitable avocations in the world, and it undoubtedly was, but the desire on the part of those engaged in other industrial pursuits to embark in it, and on the part of those already engaged to extend their operations, brought about a land speculation, under which large tracts changed hands at high prices, and the spare money was not only all invested, but a heavy residue remained in the shape of debt, secured on the land newly purchased. The farmer became rich in acres, but poor in purse, and with, in too many cases, a load of debt hanging over him. Had the seasons continued favorable all would have been well, except that the speculation would have taken a still wider range, and the collapse when it came—and come of course it must—would have been still more disastrous. As it turned out, an immense amount of capital in the shape of both money and labor was invested in the purchase and cultivation of new lands which yielded nothing, and the farmer at present is poor. He is not, however, either broken nor really discouraged; and there is hardly a part of the State where one good crop will not place him in easy circumstances. Meanwhile the speculation in lands has been checked before extreme prices were reached, which is a benefit which can hardly be over-estimated; and while irrigating canals and ditches are being constructed on an immense scale in those parts of the country where experience shows that the average rainfall is too light to render the culture of grain a positively safe business, the railroad system is spreading in net work all over the State, and the crop that is grown by the artificial distribution of water will find the means of transportation afforded the moment it is harvested.

We have the best of authority for estimating the bullion product of this coast for the coming twelve months at $65,000,000 to $70,000,000. Our agricultural product will yield us $15,000,000, making a total of say $80,000,000, which the Wheat crop of Oregon and the timber of Washington Territory will certainly increase by several millions of dollars. These are not, be it understood, crop values, but export values. They represent what we have to dispose of over and above the supply of our own wants. And yet the people of the State, and particularly the people of this city, are almost in a panic about the condition of the Pacific Coast! Why, we ourselves remember distinctly the time (and we claim still to be not more than of middle age) when the total exports of the whole United States were only $100,000,000! And here we are, on a coast only settled for a quarter of a century, trending close on the exports of a population of 20,000,000 or 25,000,000, operating in a country that had been settled for three hundred years. Fie on such despondency! We are, if we would but recognize it, in a most enviable position. Our mines are in a better shape than ever before, particularly in our knowledge of the proper method of working them; our soil is fertile beyond comparison, our population is enterprising and hardy, our flocks increase in a ratio unknown in other lands, our vineyards are climbing every mountain side, our cattle are multiplying on every hill, we abound in every element of wealth, and we firmly and honestly believe that we are upon the verge of one of the greatest leaps of prosperity that a people ever has known. What we want is to know ourselves, and properly estimate our position and resources; and this knowledge, the result of self study, should teach the capitalist of the city that his proper effort is the assistance of the country in the development of its resources, and that there is more money in the opening of new fields of labor than in all the per cents. per month which can be failed to be collected on all the fifty-vara lots in San Francisco.

BET-ROOT SUGAR.

Among the industrial pursuits in course of development in California, that of the cultivation of the white or sugar beet, and the manufacture of sugar therefrom, promises soon to take one of the most prominent places. The immense consumption of sugar in this country, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, is difficult to account for, the more so as it is cosmopolitan, and hitherto returns for the portions of the Union more strictly American in its element have shown them to be the largest consumers in the world. The consumption of sugar by different nations has shown that of France to be only 5 lbs. per capita: that of Germany and Russia somewhat higher, varying from 6 to 10 lbs.; that of England 30 lbs.; and that of the Atlantic States 40 lbs. per annum. The quantity used in various manufactures in the two latter countries in some measure accounts for this, as also the better condition of the working classes. In view of the small consumption in France, it is somewhat singular that the first attempt to utilize the beet for the production of sugar should have been inaugurated there. This was due to the action of Napoleon Bonaparte, who suggested and fostered it by stringent legal enactments prohibiting the importation of West India sugars. This has been attributed generally by political economists to his desire to injure the colonial interests of Great Britain; but as the consumption of France was comparatively so small, and as she thereby injured her own tropical colonies, this seems hardly so probable as that the development of home resources of France was his real object. The first attempts, however, were productive of but poor results, arising in part from inferior machinery and partly from lack of experience as to the best manner of cultivating the white-sugar beet, five tons of them only yielding at best 304 pounds of sugar, or 4½ per cent., while in some cases it only amounted to 3 per cent. Of late years the cultivation of beets and manufacture of sugar has made extraordinary strides in the countries of continental Europe, as an exemplification of which France produced in 1864, 135,000 tons, and in 1866, 275,000 tons. In the Zollverein, or those parts of Germany in which the duties are by treaty uniform, the products for the same years were 185,000 tons and 200,000 tons, while in Russia the produce was trebled in a few years. The yield has in some cases amounted to 8½ per cent., but this is exceptional. In America it may be said that beet-sugar manufacture is yet in its infancy. In Chutsworth, Illinois, a company was formed, but from various causes its onward course was interrupted. In our own State the California Beet Sugar Company is already an established success, and its inauguration was looked upon by many with great interest as promoting a great principle, the encouragement of self-production, thereby affording employment to many, yielding a good interest on the capital invested, and retaining the money paid for the foreign produce in circulation in the State. The signal success, therefore, of the Beet Sugar Company in its first operations is a matter of congratulation to every citizen of the Occident, and demands from them their best efforts to promote it. The Company have established their works at Alvarado, and they have been in operation for one season. They have succeeded in producing upwards of 7 per cent. of sugar from the beets. From the best information we can obtain, we gather that the crops of beets are about 20 tons to the acre, the yield of sugar being 2,800 pounds. The quantity of beets operated the past season has been 3,000 tons, producing 400,000 pounds of sugar and 15,000 gallons of molasses. In the coming season, about September, the beets to arrive will comprise the produce of about 400 acres raised by the Company, and of from 150 to 200 acres more contracted for at about $3 50 per ton delivered at the factory. The molasses already produced has been contracted for for distilling purposes. The refinery in connection with the works is at present engaged in refining Peruvian sugars, and until the beet produce is sufficient to supply constant employment the refinery of foreign sugars will be continued. The refined sugar from the beet which has been produced by the California Beet Sugar Company is acknowledged to be equal to any hitherto in the market. The capital stock of the Company is $250,000, and every improvement of modern science has been introduced into their works, rendering it complete and perfect in its details. To the extension of this establishment we look with every wish for its success as developing by its able management one of our most valuable internal resources. The following comprise the present officers of the Company: President and Treasurer, C. I. HUTCHINSON; Vice-President, BENJAMIN FLINT; Secretary, L. FRANCOIS; General Manager, A. D. BONESTEE; Superintendent of Factory, A. OTTO. Executive Committee—C. I. Hutchinson, Benjamin Flint, E. R. Carpenter.

The former

lady will receive 40,000 francs for ten performances.—Vinnie Ream is said to be a "handsome likeness of the picture of Mme. De Stael."—Exchange. We are tired of hearing of this pretty trifle in marble. She has bamboozled those Washington people, smiling them out of contracts, and we begin to fear she has been operating upon those foolish Eastern editors.—A terrible accident has occurred at Pitts-town, Penn. Fire in the mine, and eighteen men destroyed.—The steamer Prince Alfred has returned from her first round trip to British Columbia, bringing 900 tons coal, 100 bales wool, and $59,418 in treasure.—W. H. Seward and party were at Suez May 5th, and were going through Egypt. They had already traveled 30,000 miles.—The Chicago Common Council have ordered the closing of saloons from twelve o'clock Saturday night until twelve o'clock Sunday night. Here's a go: Chicago placing restrictions upon whisky shops. Whither are we drifting?—Guatemala advices say the Revolutionists had captured Escuintla. The inhabitants are highly incensed at the Government, and affairs are threatening.—In the Marine Court, New York, Grau, the Theatrical Manager, gained a suit against Brignoli for services as manager of the opera in Chicago.—The Mexican Government is increasing the regular army, which the Opposition say is to maintain Juarez in power.—A Bulletin man has been at the Twentieth Annual Commencement at Santa Clara College, and has "written up" the valley. We never saw anything like this piece of composition. In a grammatical point of view, it is fearfully wild, absurd, nonsensical, and altogether too ridiculous for the columns of the Bulletin. Friend, curb that Jenkins, keep him at home; put a stopper on his gushing, or your country friends, "the theme of his discourse," will have a mighty laugh at your expense.—Brick Pomeroy is coming to California. We shall pray for an epidemic, an earthquake, an invasion of mad dogs, anything to keep those Eastern donkeys to their domestic thistles. Brick is the last straw.—The property holders along the line of Montgomery Avenue are getting their backs up. The assessment pill is too bulky for these lambs to swallow, and their morning and evening prayer is, "woe, woe, to the Commissioners." A brisk fight is in prospect.—Twenty-five women were killed and fifty hurt at a railway accident near Paris.—The Patrie demands a rigorous suppression of the machinations of the Communists in the Provinces.—La Verite estimates the damage to Paris at eight millions of merchandise burned, excluding the docks and warehouses.—All the pieces found of the Column Vendome will be exactly restored.—The postponement of Rochefort's trial is said to be from apprehension of disclosures compromising the Government of the National Defense.—The Baltimore City Council has unanimously voted $1,000 to the widow of a policeman who was murdered while endeavoring to arrest an offender against the law.—The New York Herald recommends, as a means of prevention of horse-car outrages in that city, the introduction of the Hansom cab system.—The operations at the Daney mine are in the direction of the supposed body of ore at the bottom of the old shaft.—The Union Pacific Salt Company have declared a dividend of one-half of one per cent., payable on Saturday.—The Board of Education have prohibited corporal punishment in the schools. Nonsense, gentlemen; a wholesome application of the rod prevents many a youth from enlisting under the Hoodlum banner. Solomon was correct.—The San Domingo reports and accompanying documents are at last completed, and will be issued next week.—An explosion occurred at the California Powder Works; nobody hurt.—Bandmann and wife have arrived in New York.—Tom Thumb and party are in London.—Lucille Western is playing at the Olympic, New York.—It takes 75 wagons, 200 horses, and 175 people to run Barnum's new show. Some say wood and some say brick.

—Of course it is expected that we will defend the action of the Communists at Cherokee Flat, in burning the body of Austrian George, who murdered a young woman of that vicinity because she would not marry him. No longer ago than yesterday, we overheard a conversation in the Occidental Hotel, with regard to this roasting, and one gentleman remarked: "Bet that d—d Town Crier will justify it!" Now, we won't. It was a burning shame! Not, perhaps, what the Alta calls it: "a stain upon the civilization of the nineteenth century"—but a very senseless piece of stupidity. We do not know that our own opinion could be better expressed than in the words of our little four-year-old girl, who, upon hearing the story from the lips of her mother, said thoughtfully, that it was "all durned foolery!" [N. B.—That innocent is not in the market.] We object to it upon the ground that a roasting corpse emits a villainous smell. Cremation is good enough in theory; the practice is slightly nauseating. It is said by an eye witness that when Austrian George's head exploded with the fervent heat, the intercranial matter mused up the facade of an adjacent church, so that it will have to be repainted. If the original plan of grilling the murderer alive had been carried out, the wholesome moral lesson would have excused the legal irregularity of the proceeding. But the broiling of dead meat for any other than table purposes is childish. The good citizens of the Cherokee Flat Commune will rest under a certain social reproach until they shall establish the fact that Austrian George was cooked that they might make a meal of him. And even then, their culinary talent is open to question, for it does not appear that the body was buttered and seasoned before being put upon the coals.

Stock Review.

A heavy business has been done during the past week in a number of leading stocks, as reported in the Board transactions, and a still heavier business outside, in the purchase of a large amount of Crown Point stock at the recent advanced price. Crown Point gradually rose to $300, at which price the large purchase of 4,100 shares were sold, amounting to $1,230,000. The amount of ore reduced during the fiscal year was 21,087 tons, showing an average yield of $22.39 per ton. The assets are stated to be $273,812; liabilities, none. A dividend of $10 per share, amounting to $120,000, will be paid on the 10th inst. Board of Directors: J. D. Fry, A. Hayward, Robert Sherwood, James A. Pritchard and B. Peart. Secretary, Charles E. Elliott; Superintendent, John P. Jones. CHOLLAR-POTOSI has been selling rather freely at a slight decline. Extracted 1,600 tons of ore during the week ending June 3d, showing an average assay value of $56.20 per ton. HALE & NORCROSS is dull of sale. The report for the week ending June 3d, shows an average yield of 1,044 tons against 1,190 tons the previous week. YELLOW JACKET continues to sell quite largely under a recession. GOLDEN CHARIOT receipts for May, $13,884. MEADOW VALLEY receipts for the month of May netted $119,000. Ida Emore, $14@ $14½; Lady Bryan, $4; Golden Chariot, $47½@ $49; Yellow Jacket, $69@ $71½; Belcher, $160@ $165; Segregated Belcher $11@ $11½; Chollar-Potosi, $47@ $57½; Overman, $82@ $9; Gould & Curry, $82@ $88; Hale & Norcross, $67; Kentuck, $117@ $120; Savage, $43@ $45½; Ophir, $7½@ $7¾; Crown Point, $325@ $330; Meadow Valley, $18@ $18½; Original Hidden Treasure, $10½@ $11; Phoenix, $1 70; Raymond & Ely, $20½@ $21.

A Poem in Five Delirious Spasms.

SPASM I.—PRELIMINARY.

Pardoned may be in one who's struck it rich
In lotteries, a temperate hazzza.
To him to whom intelligence is come
That all his hated rival's comely face
Is honeycombed with small-pox, it were hard
Some decorous rejoicing to deny.
In one whose father is but freshly dead,
And whose estate has thereby been ex-
hanced,
A mild exulting is excusable.

SPASM II.—GENERAL.

Such joys as these are sweet, indeed; and yet
They season life like pepper, vulgar salt
Or cheap spice, and scarce incite the Muse.
But when the Devil in his steamy pit
Is tethered by the Angel of the Law—
Bound thong on thong and fettered hard with gyves—
Springs the bright goddess from her lofty perch,
On sounding pinions, to inspire the brain
(With gin or lager, as his means afford)
Of some terrestrial poet, saying, "Sing!"
Straight from his larynx fly the headed notes,
And all creation rings with the event!

*The reader will pardon the peculiar diction of this spasm: when swayed by some powerful emotion the true poet always glides insensibly into his MUTTER-SPEECH.
Vide Bret Harte and John May.

SPASM III.—PARTICULAR.

If e'er supreme felicity may claim
Expression in hosannas, loud and long
And throated welkinward with hearty lung,
Lo! now the time; and the occasion see
In righteous sentence upon Laura Fair.
For, ecce poësis! harlots shall no more
With speaking pistol plead their wicked cause:
A man may keep his mistress, unafraid,
Secure to shake her if it seems him good—
A right unquestioned till these evil days.

SPASM IV.—DIALECTIC.*

Come, all you fellers, let us lick'er up!
Dod rot our hides! we've fit a holy fount,
We've hung onto the faith, and we hev licked.
The pow'rs o' sentiment hev not pervaded:
We've slow 'em and we've smote 'em,
hip and thigh!

SPASM V.—CONGRATULATORY.

No more Pitts-Stevens shall exalt her horn—
Nay, with her top-side, high-up free-love talk,
Shall flee into the hills of Hepsidam,
Where Leo jars the forest with his breath,
And the bereaved Whangdoodle garbs herself
In sable for her first-born. It is well.

Proposed Coast Railroad.

On Thursday afternoon a number of our leading business men met in the room of the Chamber of Commerce to take measures for the reception of the Directors of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, who were invited last fall to visit San Francisco to consult with the business men here upon the proposed construction of a coast line of railroad connecting with the overland railroad from the Atlantic by way of St. Louis. The invitation was accepted and the visitors will be here to-night. The Directors expect to have 750 miles down by the 1st of January, 1872, and desire to commence the road from the Pacific terminus as early as possible. A reconnaissance, he said, had been made last fall, and a corps of engineers was now in the field making a permanent location for the line. The meeting having been duly organized, S. P. Dewey introduced the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, This meeting fully recognizes the great importance to our city, as well as to the entire State of California and the Pacific Coast, of the early completion of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, which will traverse a vast section of country filled with agricultural and mineral resources which has been and is now closed to the enterprise of our merchants and manufacturers, consequent upon the difficulties of transportation, and

Whereas, We believe that the speedy construction of another trans-continental line of railroad from San Francisco to St. Louis is particularly desirable, as giving to us the benefit of competition; and

Whereas, The Board of Trustees of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company will reach our city on the 10th inst., with the view of conferring with the citizens of our State, as well as to see for themselves what facilities will be offered them in the construction of this important work; and

Whereas, It is desirable that our citizens should extend to these gentlemen a cordial welcome, and should also co-operate with them in the objects of their mission; and

Whereas, It is also desirable that our citizens should be fully informed by the Railroad Company of their requirements, as well as of their present status and future prospects, in order that we may act judiciously in the premises. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chairman of this meeting be authorized and requested to appoint a Committee of our citizens, whose duty it shall be to wait upon the Trustees of the Company, and extend to them a warm greeting upon our behalf, and also request them to name a day when they will lay before our citizens, at a public meeting to be called by said Committee, a full and comprehensive view of the objects of their mission.

The resolutions, with some slight amendments, were unanimously carried.

Court Chat.

Lord Brougham, in his "Recollections of a Long Life," gives the following amusing account of a royal game of chess between Queen Victoria and the Queen of the Belgians: "The dinner at the Castle this day passed off agreeably, and, when in the drawing-room, the Queen sat down to chess with the Queen of the Belgians. H. M. had never played before; Lord Melbourne told her how to move, and Lord Palmerston also assisted her. I looked on for some time, without taking part in the game, and I might as well have abstained altogether; for when Melbourne and Palmerston gave up advising her Majesty, in order that I might succeed to them, I did not succeed better than my colleagues. I was very near winning the game, when I lost it by an oversight, and by being very often asked by her Majesty, 'What must I do?' There was also some little confusion created by the two queens on the board and the two Queens at the table. Her Majesty was not so discouraged by her defeat as to prevent her playing again the evening after this. Who played for the Queen I do not know; but H. M. ran up to me laughing, and saying she had won. She asked me how she came to lose yesterday. I replied, 'Because your Majesty had such bad advisers;' on which she laughed heartily, and so did the Queen of the Belgians, who, by the way, spoke English well."

The Right Hon. the Earl of Carnarvon presided at the eighth annual festival of the Newspaper and Press Fund on Saturday evening, May 13th, at Willis' Rooms, King street, St. James's. The general company included his Excellency the Spanish Minister, his Excellency the St. Salvador Minister, his Excellency the Honduras Minister, his Excellency the Haytian Minister, the American Chargé d'Affaires, the Marquis of Bute, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, Lord Houghton, the President of the Society, Mr. Godwin, F.R.S., Mr. Arthur Helps, Hon. E. Ashley, Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., Mr. Horace Lloyd, Q.C., Dr. F. Winslow, and numerous others distinguished in the fashionable and literary world. The noble chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening, made an appropriate and eloquent speech.

The project of a matrimonial alliance between the Prince of Orange and the Grand Duchess Maria, only daughter of the Emperor of Russia, has been abandoned. The Prince was received with extraordinary distinction on the occasion of his recent visit to the Russian Court. He was received by the Governor of the Baltic provinces on the frontier, by the Grand Duke of Oldenburg at Gatchin, and by the Emperor himself at the St. Petersburg Railway Station; and, though the matter was kept strictly secret, there can be no doubt that at the time of his visit the projected alliance was viewed with favor at the Russian Court. The affair has naturally given rise to much gossip in the Russian capital, and all sorts of rumors are current as to the real cause of the failure of the marriage negotiations.

The following were some of the costumes at the Queen's Levee: The Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar wore a fuchsia silk gown trimmed with dark green velvet leaves and white lace; the Duchess of Manchester wore a white satin dress, trimmed with variegated leaves; the Marchioness of Westminster's dress was of white poulx de soie, trimmed with gold; the Countess of Stradbroke wore an entire dress of yellow; the Countess of Sefton's dress consisted of a white satin gown, trimmed with tulle and flowers; the Marchioness of Huntly wore a rose thé tulle dress, trimmed with flowers and lace; Mrs. Saville-Onley's dress was of mauve satin.

The American press, says the Court Journal is still very much exercised about what ought to be done with the Marquis of Lorn. They do not propose to offer him the Presidency on condition of (figuratively) swallowing the "Tammam ticket" or any other "platform," but they think he might be made Governor-General of Canada. They also draw a moral from the "sound Republican" conduct of the Princess Louisa, and hope that her example will benefit the American maidens, who are always thinking of Russian counts and German barons.

While diamonds are increasing in value, pearls seem to be somewhat depreciated. The famous pearl necklace bridal gift of the Empress Eugénie to the Princess Anna Murat, has been sold in London for $18,000. The necklace was made by Lemonnier, and its original cost not less than $60,000.

When the Princess Christian has sufficiently recovered her health, her Royal Highness will leave Frogmore House for change of air. The Prince and Princess Christian did not accompany the Queen to Scotland, owing to the health of the Princess, which would not allow her to undertake so long a journey.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has taken Titniss Park, Sunninghill, the seat of the Earl of Yarborough, for the Ascot race week, and it is expected that this will be a very brilliant season, as fashionable company are already daily arriving at Windsor, Ascot, and the surrounding neighborhood.

It is said there is a probability that Mr. Gladstone, whose "strong and deep admiration" of Sir Walter Scott has recently been publicly announced in a letter addressed by the Prime Minister to Mr. J. R. Hope Scott, will be present at the centenary celebration in Edinburgh on the 9th of August.

The London papers say the Albert Hall concerts do not give satisfaction. Music is essentially a thing to be heard, not seen, and only half what is desired is gained by looking at the elbows of fiddlers working backwards and forwards, and the piston movement of hornists.

At the Queen's Levee on Saturday, May 13th, there were two hundred presentations.

Our European Reflex.

We briefly referred to the telegraphic dispatch informing us that the Comte de Chambord had issued a manifesto couched in the form of a letter to one of his friends, who oddly enough or purposely enough gives it to a member of the Republican Chamber, whence it is promulgated to the whole world. From it we learn that the Orleans branch of the family cedes for the nonce to the descendant of the house that Louis Philippe ejected from the throne, and are willing to serve their country under the son of the Duchess of Berry, videlicet Henry V. There is nothing strange in this. The Ulysses-like cunning of the father of the Duke d'Aumale has been inherited by the son. Paris is subdued and repentant, unable to resist if not willing to submit to a regal yoke; the provinces are in a fever of loyalty or anything that will restore order and humiliate the capital: the Comte de Chambord is old, childless and biggoted; the first gives him a short tenure of office, the second leaves him without a direct representative, and the third causes the nation to look kindly toward the liberal branch of the family that has behaved so wisely in exile and with equal wisdom declared on all exigencies its love and sympathy for France. Again, at this moment the ruler of France, either by divine or elective right, does not lie upon a bed of roses. A conquered sullen capital, a conquered impoverished people, an immense ransom to be paid and general order and government to be maintained, such a task with the title of King Henry the Fifth of France would only be undertaken by one who saw that unless he seized the present opportunity death would rob him of the desire of his life. The crafty Orleans family can wait, and in the meantime the members of it obey Louis Philippe's earnest injunction three days before his death to restore the throne if possible to the elder branch. France, meanwhile, is in the attitude of a nation waiting for something to turn up. Thiers declines an extension or enlargement of his powers. Paris is a mixture of gaiety and desolation. The theaters and cafés gradually open and the light-hearted Frenchman laughs again, only he must go home betimes and public places must close at seven hours, and there is an ugly look of patrols and sentinels guarding Montmartre and Belleville, and the foreigners have not begun to flock in, nor have the fugitives returned in great numbers, and the signs of wealth and opulence and luxury are wanting. The Assembly meanwhile debating whether the column of the Place Vendôme should be restored or not, as if the indignity once done could be effaced by replacement, and general squabbling among the members. Gambetta remaining wisely on the Spanish frontier aloof from rebellion that he would be powerless to quell, and away from a Convention with whom he has nothing in common. When the true history of the late war comes to be written the character of this man will be unveiled. To believe one party, he is a consummate, ignorant scoundrel, whilst the other side extol his self-sacrifice and wondrous administrative ability. In the midst of all the work of slaughter in Paris and that regeneration of blood which has sprung from that baptism of fire, now an historical by-word, we have the sad spectacle of the funeral of the good Archbishop Tarbey, who remained in the city that he loved during the whole siege; who, spite of threats, publicly held High Mass for the souls of those who had been slain in defence of their country, and whose simple words, "My friends, I am not afraid to die, seeing that my shadow is already on my grave," should have disarmed the most ferocious; he was buried with other priestly victims. The Orleans Princes are working their way silently forward, but Thiers puzzles us. He is not unfriendly to the house of his old master, although perhaps he lent a helping hand to his fall. He proclaims a republic, but refuses to be its principal executive after a term; he desires the extradition of the Princes to be annulled, but would refuse them civic rights. Does he think that his advocacy would be noxious to their cause? Mirès, the banker, is dead, and with him dies a host of schemes financial, speculative and political. In England a new question has arisen springing from ease of inter-communication. Why should not English society in its highest sense permanently settle in the British Colonies? And why should not Colonial Governments grant titles and honors like that at home? There was a time in the history of America when English nobility did establish itself, and had her American Colonies remained in the possession of the British Crown many an ancient family would have been represented in what is now the United States. Why should not the same obtain in Australia or Canada? Another question arose on the debate upon the disestablishment of the English Church in answer to the cry of increase of population as well as increase of dissent. It was: Cannot the Church be widened so as to admit the increase, instead of rending it asunder on account of its exuberant growth? In other words, cannot the Church enlarge its borders and yet maintain its defences, and by yielding on minor points of doctrine embrace within its folds many of those who hang on its skirts, lingering at the porch, forbidden to enter by reason of a weak dogma only adhered to because it is attacked.

— The Alta has a half column article upon "The Lesson of the Late Civil War in France." The "lesson" is stated impressively as follows: "It is a very dangerous thing to go to extremes!" But the writer commits the grave rhetorical mistake of stating this stupendous proposition at the very beginning of his article. He should have begun by slightly scratching the surface of his head and his subject, then clawed away the superficial difficulties from each, then got into the hole in the latter, and so dug his way gradually down to this profound conclusion. He would then have found himself about an inch into the upper crust of the question.

Money and Commerce.

— Imports of provisions overland this year are more important than is generally supposed. The Commercial Herald says: John Y. Wilson & Co.'s purchases in Chicago, now here and en route, approximate 800,000 lbs, chiefly Bacon Sides, although including sugar-cured Hams, Lard, etc. Thomas Cross & Sons, of Portland, Oregon, are the next largest packers and receivers in Illinois. Then comes W. K. Dieterich, of Washington Market, with his Bacon, Hams, and Lard. Duffield, of Chicago, sends us this season about 1,000 cks sugar-cured Hams and boneless Bacon. Whittaker, of St. Louis, also sends us Hams in quantities; J. Morrison & Co., of Cincinnati, sugar-cured Hams. Then we have the Magnolia Hams from Kentucky; Andrew Brown's Hams from Chicago, and others, too numerous to mention. Considerable Lard has also been sent us from Cleveland; also 55 tes of same from Kansas. And during the current week we have received from Iowa five car-loads of fat Hogs—in all 330 head, weighing from 180 to 220 lbs each. These animals are held at 8c per lb. It is not probable that any considerable business will be done in bringing swine to this coast by rail, certainly not this warm weather; the risk is great and the shrinkage considerable.

— The vast and rapid increase of our overland traffic, says the Commercial Herald, is the occasion of considerable remark in all commercial circles. Already the present year, nearly two millions pounds of provisions have been received from the East, chiefly Bacon, Hams, Shoulders, Butter, Lard and Eggs. In exchange for these we have shipped East the present season eight million pounds of Wool, many thousand gallons of Wine, several car-loads of Hops; and as an offset to the general merchandise received, we have sent East in return several hundred tons of Tea, Coffee, and the like. It is in this way that we manage to build up a large and profitable reciprocity trade with the Atlantic side of the continent. Our Eastern friends are beginning to admit that the route via San Francisco is the shortest and best for the importation of Teas, Silks, Spices, etc., from China and Japan, and we have already noted the fact of increased attention given to the subject by Eastern capitalists, who are now en route to Hongkong and Yokohama to complete needed plans for the future wants of this growing trade.

— Of sugars, the steamship City of Melbourne, from Australian ports, via Honolulu, brings 1,600 kegs Island Raws; otherwise we are without imports during the week. Of the 600 pkgs Nicaragua Raws recently imported in bags, boxes, tierces and bbls, a portion was superior in quality, paying 4c per lb duty; there were about 69,000 lbs of high grocery grades, 160,000 lbs refining grades, including Melado; also 120,000 lbs of medium quality. The bulk of this invoice has been sold upon terms reserved. The refining portion was secured by the California Refinery; the same party has also purchased the cargo of 600,000 lbs Peruvian, ex Leopoldina, upon terms reserved. The market for Hawaiian and other Raws shows a good degree of firmness. We quote Hawaiian at 8@10½c. The demand for Refined Sugars is about equal to the supply, leaving no stock accumulations and keeping prices steady.

— The advantages and economy of Gypsum are worthy of especial notice by vinegrowers; if the trimmings of the vines are cut into small pieces, put beneath the surface of the soil and sprinkled with Gypsum, no other manure of any kind is ever wanted, as they supply all the essentials for the nourishment of the plant. So rapidly do the cuttings decay and become reincorporated with their mother soil to nourish it, that in four to eight weeks they will be found to have completely disappeared. Much greater results have been obtained by this simple and inexpensive treatment than by the most elaborate system of manuring.

— The Redwood Lumber Association quote as follows: Rough, $15; Surfaced, tongued and grooved, $28; rustic, worked, $31; siding and battens, ½ inch, $20; same, surfaced, $25; rough pickets, $14; same pointed, $16; dressed do, $22 50. We quote cargo lots of Oregon Pine at $14, and Spruce at $16 50 per M feet for rough. Sale of 275,000 feet Redwood and other descriptions, for export, private.

— "A dividend is the surplus, the remainder, the result, end of a transaction, divided amongst the shareholders—hence the word divide-ends. An apothecary originally carried his medicine about in jars—he was a pot-carrier—and from thence the word a-pot-he-carries."

— The two last cargoes of Central American Coffee have been withdrawn from sale, while most, if not all the other lots of the same description, have been placed at 15½c; Rio and Manila are nominal at 14½c; Kona, 15½c; Java, 25c.

— The increased imports of foreign wool at New York and Boston are noteworthy, being eighty per cent. larger than for the same time last year. Our market continues quite active at full rates.

— Five car loads of live hogs, aggregating 330, and weighing from 180 to 220 lbs. each, just received by rail from Iowa, and sold at 7¼@8c.; same importer has telegraphed for more.

— Paper pans and tubs are growing in favor. They are strong, bear boiling heat well, rough usage or exposure to the sun, and are more durable than either tin or earthenware.

— Wonderful discoveries of coal mines and oil wells have been made thirty miles from Aspinwall. The coal is said to be equal to the best imported.

Parson Hunting Extraordinary.

We have seldom read anything racier than the account given at a prayer meeting of the Howard Presbyterian Church (late Dr. Scudder's), by the Senior Elder, Samuel J. C. Sweezy, of his race or hunt for a parson. One minister considered San Francisco a "very hard place," and was afraid of it. Another so pleased the Elder by his morning's discourse that he deemed him a pastor "eminently fitted for their church," but as "he didn't like him at all in the evening, his style didn't suit him." Perhaps Sweezy likes an "eye-opener" of a morning and a "night cap" of an evening. If so, why not close the church in the evening and engage the successful morning man? He made Beecher "a most tempting offer, but after taking a week to consider, he declined." Of course he did, for Howard Street can't afford $12,500, which Plymouth Church gives him. He then tried Dr. John Hall, who was otherwise engaged. In Boston the migrating Elder "had a real good time, and was in a fine mood to hear superior preachers, but he found nothing desirable." That Stoney soil has already been sufficiently dug into, Brooklyn and Philadelphia had fine specimens of the clerical biped, but they were not fascinated by his offer. One man he liked so much that he went to hear him three times and got into communication with him, but the congregation would not let him come. At last the Elder in despair button-holed a Thomson (without a p), a fellow schoolboy of old Scudder, who promises to come from the 24th of July to the 1st of September. The Elder gives a flattering description of him. "He is not a great man (this is superfluous information, for if he were he would not come to Howard street), not eloquent nor polished." Poor Thomson; he has little chance of obtaining any polish where he's coming to. But then Thomson has "magnificent thoughts, and speaks great truths," and the Elder has no doubt that the Howard Street Church "will be greatly blessed by his coming." Well, we hope so, for they need ideas sadly. Sweezy saw Scudder—that eminent vegetable still lives. He didn't hear him preach, but he heard him pray, and tell yarns about his San Francisco flock. That is Scudder's capital in trade. He is powerful as a theological gossip and performs fresh miracles by recounting his old ones. Scudder is physically improved and "in full vigor of body." But how about his soul, Elder, is that better? Yes, it is; for they have promised him $250,000 for a new Scudderoleum. The Elder says that "although he could find suitable men, he could not find any like Scudder;" of course not, one such is enough for a generation. He thinks that "a different part of their (the Howard Street) nature would have to be cultivated to render them fit to sit under another pastor." So do we. Let the reasoning part be developed, and they may in time become fit even to sit under the News Letter. The indefatigable Elder closes with the complacent remark that he has come back "with some of his old power." What was that? We didn't know he had any. Oh, "with some of his old power to strain every nerve." Ah, that is a great gift, the power to strain, not the heavenly strain of Watts, but the nerve-strain which is in tension at prayer-meeting and Sunday School. Go on straining, Elder, till you burst, only never "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel," or you will have the dyspepsia. Let us now narrate the Elder's Parson-hunt in becoming verse:

THE ELDER'S PARSON-HUNT.

Howard Street Sweezy
Found it not easy
To get a successor to Scudder;
He liked every one best
Till he heard the rest,
And then didn't know one from t'other.

One's style was too prosy,
And his accent too nosy,
To suit such profound connoisseurs;
One was for saying too many,
T'other wouldn't save any,
Some were dandies and others were boors.

This one's terms were too dear,
That one's views were not clear,
And a third hadn't brimstone sufficient:
Says Sweezy, I'll not fool yer,
Our people are peculiar,
And can't stand a man who's deficient.

They want it hot and strong,
In sermons not too long,
And a parson must be pretty brisk, oh!
To find a new sensation
For each week's exhortation,
That will tickle the sinners of Frisco.

Some were loud as a trumpet,
Some buttered like crumpet,
Some silvery soft like a lute;
One had style syllogistic
And action quite static,
While another looked grave as a mute.

'Twouldn't do to have a croaker,
After so eminent a joker
As Scudder, so he wouldn't answer;
One might "kick against the pricks,"
And another "cut his sticks,"
And a third prove a regular prancer.

Then he asked Doctor Hall,
"If we give you a call
To Howard Street Church—will you come?
I'm sure that Fifth Avenue
Won't mind our having you,"
But Hall shook his head and was mum.

When the parson was willing
To earn an extra shilling,
The church cried, "Oh, no! what a pity!"
He's a comfort to us
And might get in a muss
In such a rough place as your city.

He asked Henry Ward Beecher,
That eloquent preacher,
Who did at his impudence shudder,
And said, with a wry mouth,
"Can the Pastor of Plymouth, Play second fiddle to Scudder?"

So this excellent people
With a church and a steeple,
A sexton, a bell and a Sweezy,
No parson can get,
They're so hard to fit,
And to come after Scudder ain't easy.

Opinions of the "Mail Bag."

The appearance of the initial number of the Mail Bag has created a veritable sensation throughout the country. The publisher has been deluged with congratulatory letters from all quarters, expressing the highest appreciation of the enterprise. We give a few brief extracts from the communications to which we have referred, showing what our leading citizens think of the Mail Bag:

"It is a stunning novelty. Such a thing was never dreamed of before; and yet I ask myself why was it never dreamed of before? I see a fortune in it. It beats banking.

W. C. R—LST—N."

"It is the crowning idea of the nineteenth century, and the most thoroughly original and absolutely unique literary enterprise of this generation. It is finer than wheat.

I. FR—DL—ND—R."

"It is more exhilarating than our California sparkling wines.

L—NDSB—RG—R & Co."

"It is saucy, cynical, savage, sceptical, scurrilous, and strabismic. The writers evidently derived their inspiration from copious libations of the 'Excellent.'

B—RRY & P—TT—N."

"Send me 1,000 copies. They are devilish good. Send me 2,000 copies, and by G— I'll read them all.

CH—RL—S CR—CK—R."

"I have perused with interest the first number of the Mail Bag, and shall recommend it to my aristocratic friends in England, as an exponent of the progressive and irreverent tendencies in this country. You are aware that I have been threatened with cataract and have had an operation performed upon my eyes. I cannot be sufficiently grateful to Divine Providence that my sight has been restored in time to enable me to enjoy the pleasure of reading the first number of your delightful periodical.

W. INGR—H—M K—P, Bishop of California."

"P. S.—I am glad you republish the Town Crier's screeds in the M. B. I find them useful in composing my sermons."

"I see clearly that the Mail Bag is bound to be a power. What would be your figure for taking up for me as Gubernatorial candidate? If you don't make it too steep, we might come to an arrangement. I might go a thousand cash, and as much more contingent, with perhaps a small office for one of your friends after I'm in.

"Your Mail Bag is an amazing affair. There has never been anything in literature like it. It is 'grand, gloomy and peculiar.' It combines the practical and the theoretical in a way that is astonishing. It represents all our national interests in an intelligent and sober style, and at the same time furnishes us with an inexhaustible fund of amusement.

M—LT—N S. L—THR—P."

"I've seen it, my dear boy and it will do. I say so who know about these things. Credite experto. It's a thing of beauty and a joy, my boy. Nothing short of it. I once had a dear gazelle myself, and am an old newspaper man at that. By by, old boy.

"P. S.—You may have my picture, if you like, for the next number. Adieu."

"It has tickled my ribs and shaken my diaphragm hugely. I shall have to get a new pair of sides.

"I have read the advertisements with great relish. I also admire the pictures. The rest of the matter is not interesting. There is, it appears to me, too much indiscretion in the editorials. They all express opinions. It is believed by the best newspaper men that the secret of success is in either expressing no opinion at all, or expressing one on both sides, which unites prudence with impartiality.

Decoration Day.

O Day of sweet blossoms
And memories sweet,
That now on the altar
Of liberty meet,
And mingle their incense
Alike to perfume
The corporal's grave
And the general's tomb!
Wherever are sleeping
Our patriot brave,
A wreath is descending
For every grave,
As if the archangels
In many a crown
Had woven a rainbow
And showered it down.
Appleton's Journal.

Flowers of the magnolia
The South brings forth,
And twines them to-day
With the rose of the North;
For over the fallen
We plighted our troth,
And the dead of the Union
Belong to us both.
If we have forgotten
Some mound on the hills—
Some miniature grave
That a drummer-boy fills—
God above it will hang
When the evening lowers,
A star-spangled banner
Sublimar than ours.

— Clarence F. Buhler.

Theatrical.

Enoch Arden has drawn good houses during the week, and has given Mr. Adams an opportunity to exhibit his best points as an artist. The peculiarly emotional and intense style of this gentleman finds appropriate utterance in the character of Temyson's shipwrecked sailor, and his full, melodious voice gave fine effect to the flowing lines of the part. Miss May Howard looked most interesting as "Annie Leigh," and played the character sympathetically. Mrs. Judah as "Miriam Lane," was a perfect picture, as usual. Mr. James Carden played "Phillis Ray" impressively, and Messrs. Leach, Buckley and Leathes sustained the parts of "Peter Lane," the "Bont-wain," and "Captain Sterling," admirably. The incidental music was given by a full body of voices, and would have been excellent, had it only been in tune, while the mise en scene was perfection. The Emerson darkeys pursue the even tenor of their way at the Alhambra, and Mr. Maguire's benefit was a well deserved tribute to one who has been a faithful and devoted servant of the public, and who has spared no pains nor expense in bringing talent to our city, frequently to his own detriment peculiarly. Wm. Hager's allegory of "The Great Republic" is a right good show. Miss Cora Balleau possesses all the requisites for a good actress, and would make a brilliant acquisition to the dramatic profession. The other two young ladies who sang, have lovely voices, which only need a training, such as they could get at the Musical Institute, to become fine vocalists, while Miss Morrison achieved an almost unparalleled feat in the rapid and perfect study of "The Goddess of Liberty" in the space of one day; her delivery of the lines was marked by both "emphasis and discretion."

— In a recent case, the New York Court of Appeals decided that a traveler on a public thoroughfare, in crossing a railroad, is justified in supposing that an approaching train will give the usual warning by bell or whistle. Says the Court: "In determining the degree of caution which he will exercise, he has a perfect right to act upon the assumption that the railroad company will obey the law." O just and upright Judge! He has indeed an inalienable right—a God-given right! Our advice to all is to assert that right; assert it constantly—as often per day as you have time. Go out of your way to assert it! You will certainly get killed at it, but what is life if it must be maintained by the sacrifice of your right to believe that a railroad company will obey the law? A bleak, cheerless, desolate waste! A moonless night lighted by no ray of hope! A howling wilderness of distrust! Rob us of our abiding faith in railroad companies, and you may take all the rest!—all— all—mother-in-law, income tax, everything but our hope in heaven, and we won't quarrel about that. We don't wish to enjoy our meals when we lose our childlike trust in the absolute goodness of railroad companies.

— It is pleasing to know that during vacation the students of the Pacific Theological Seminary will not consume with the rust of inactivity. One goes into the colporteur business, giving away bibles and selling nice rosewood boxes to keep them in. Another will discipline his mind by organizing sham Sunday-schools, and then disbanding them for want of funds. This fellow will be followed by an accomplice, who will preach, and take up a collection afterward to pay unsettled bills against his precursor. Still another will turn his attention to converting the wooden Indians at the doors of the tobacco-conists—a work of pure benevolence, for which he expects no earthly reward, as he is paid out of the missionary fund. Meantime, the Rev. Dr. Gapewallet will go East to solicit aid for the Seminary. Anything that has either intrinsic, representative, or sentimental value—like a crowbar, a check on a bank of pipe-clay, and the shriveled heel of an early Christian martyr, respectively—will be gratefully accepted. The motto of the Seminary is, "All is gold, whether it glitters or not, provided no equivalent is demanded."

A Ripening Harvest of Horrors.

The camp meeting has closed; the great tent is folded, and the lot on the corner of Stockton and O'Farrell streets, abandoned by the evangelical sharps, is again one of the unsanctified waste places of the city. The uncouth saints with brows of brass and lungs of leather, are by this time, bellowing their best in Salt Lake City. We are now on the lookout for the revulsion in public feeling, and the outburst of immorality which are the sure consequences of too heavy a cram of spiritual food. During the next month or two we confidently expect that Satan will be on the rampage in our midst, and that we shall witness such "high jinks" on the part of his reclaimed and reconverted disciples as will greatly afflict the pious soul. There will be tribulation in households wherein are converted servant girls. The contents of ash-barrels will be looked to with more than common interest, and they will pan out rich, as they always do after a camp meeting. It will be a good time for the itemizers of the daily papers, who will reap an appetizing harvest of horrors. The slaughter of large families of sleeping innocents by their depraved parents, and the extermination of unsuspecting parents by their demoralized off-spring will impart an unaccustomed charm to the local columns of the matutinal journal. There will be whole columns of delectable gossip for the "prurient pride," perennial supplies of Scan. Mag., and all manner of naughty rumors affecting "our best society." It will be our congenial mission, when the reaction has fairly set in to chronicle the sensational incidents tending to illustrate the fact that Satan never garners so abundant a harvest as when he condescends to the humble rôle of a gleaner in the wake of a camp meeting.

Immigratory.

The Immigration Society of the European and Oregon Land Company have dispatched an agent to Germany, to induce the industrious Teut to settle in the Web-foot country. The Society has an agency at Frankfort, and will establish others at various points in Deutschland. The President of this concern is Mr. John S. Wilson, for the past twenty-five years Commissioner of the Land Office at Washington, and who may, therefore, be presumed to know something about the public domain and the method of obtaining slices off it. Mr. W. F. Roelofson is the Vice-President, and will soon leave for the old country in the interest of the scheme. Mr. Hermann G. Müller, the agent already on his way, is an old Californian, and was formerly associate editor upon the German Democrat, of this city, and has been for many years engaged in the practice of the law. He is a capable man, thoroughly conversant with his business. We shall await the patter of the German robot upon the Oregonian shore, with a cheerful confidence that ere many days the toe of the same shall be pointed hitherward. The climate of Oregon is a peculiarly trying one, but ours—well, we think we speak within the bounds when we say it is "the finest in the world, sir." Seriously, we have no doubt but this immigration movement is a healthy one, well devised to benefit the whole coast, unless it shall be counteracted by some Irish immigration scheme of equal boldness and vitality.

— The man who infests the Mercantile Library and reads the newspaper over your shoulder, or while you are perusing one side of it centers his soul upon the other, has been heard to remark that he regards a table-knife as the appointed instrument of Providence (the man is pious) for the transportation of peas from plate to palate. He is known also to favor a condition of underclothing quite at variance with his cleanly exterior. He is so unfamiliar with a certain article of toilet utility that he spells it "sope." His hair he prefers pasted horizontally across his forehead, and redolent of animal fat. One of his cherished habits is to blow his nose without the intervention of a handkerchief, and wipe his fingers upon the tail of his coat. An amiable weakness for socks with holes in them takes the place in his life of some nobler affection. We learn that he is under indictment for thieving the nosebag off a starving mule, and once served a term in the County Jail for monopolizing the benefit of a scratching post erected by a benevolent gentleman for the delectation of hogs in general. We clamor for his prompt suppression.

— Moses Remington, who shot his wife in the head at Virginia City, has been sentenced to two and a half years in the penitentiary. He expresses the hope that at the expiration of his term his wife will have sufficiently recovered to get along without any future rebukes from the mouth of the conjugal revolver, as he cannot afford to idle away half his life in prison. Mr. Remington is of the thought that if mothers having daughters to prepare for market would make a more liberal use of the pistol they would save their future sons-in-law a deal of educational responsibility. It is perhaps needless to say that in this thing our soul is in perfect accord with the soul of Mr. Remington.

— A beautiful and accomplished young lady has opened a large shoe store in Philadelphia. All her clerks are of her sex, are handsome and wear fancy little leather aprons. They are irresistible, and the store is a grand success.

Puss on Protection.

"Protecting small birds,"
Said Puss, with a purr,
As her eyes caught the words—
And it a small blame to her.

For a bill for protection of small birds is just what a cat would prefer!

"Well, I'm glad to observe,"
Said the cat, with a smile,
"That men have the nerve,
Just for once on a while,

To do what is right—for the way in which men shoot down small birds is vile!

"The creatures should know
What good the birds do;
Nor slaughter them, though
They of seeds steal a few.

They should think of the grubs and such pests which the small birds alone can subdue."

Having made which remark,
Puss the garden next sought;
And ere long with a lark
Returned which she'd caught;

Which you'll say after all of her preaching was not doing quite what she ought!

But, if you think so
You're an ignorant elf;
For a wise man would know,
How for profit or pelf,

A rogue uses arguments perfect and proper—and then helps himself!

Arizona News.

From private sources we learn that a short time since Captain Moore of Company F., Third United States Cavalry, with fifty mounted men under his command, during a scout near Calabazas met with Chacise, the noted Apache Chief, and three hundred warriors. The red devils immediately offered battle, which Captain Moore declined, the difference in the opposing forces being too great. From the same source we learn that during the command of the department by Stoneman the Apaches were possessed of the idea that the Government had concluded to withdraw all troops from the Territory and leave the settlers to the tender mercies of the savages. Consequently Chacise and other noted leaders have been receiving daily accessions to their ranks. For the safety of the defenceless whites who now inhabit Arizona, it is to be hoped that General Crook will immediately, upon assuming command, issue orders for the extermination of the fiends who are committing atrocities too horrible for print.

— For fifteen years daily, at Stamford, Conn., a man has sat on a fence and watched every railroad train as it passed.—Exchange. [He is probably trying to make up his mind if it would be safe to ride in the cars. Old fellow, you stick to that fence! If the top rail is sharp turn it over, or put a cushion on it. Fit up a smoking apartment on the next panel, if you like, and rig a luxurious couch on the next one to that. Bring out your baggage, take a check for it and hang it on a post. Buy a ticket and punch it yourself. Ask yourself the distance to the next station and get insulted. Secure, as your means will permit, all the luxuries of railroad travel, but don't get off that fence to enjoy them. So shall you die a natural death, and the good wife shall not expend the farm fighting the life insurance companies over your cold corpse. You're in the right o' this thing, old rooster!

— If we only had the power of divining the future what fun we could have, without materially deranging the predestined course of events. For example, if the Town Crier could have certainly known that four ladies were to break their arms at the Napa Skating Rink this season, he might easily have secured the privilege of breaking those members himself, as it would have made no difference to the fair skaters, and would have been to him an exquisite delight. Fancy the refined pleasure of spreading out a lady on the skating floor, and whacking away at her arm with the back of an axe!

— We have on our desk a communication from a country subscriber, who bewails the loss of his "gurl" in heartrending terms, and asks us to condole with him. Our subscriber's description of his "Yed feelings" has caused us many hours of unrest. In fact, we have lost many minutes of sleep in recalling to memory a friend who is now boarding at the expense of the State. We condole with country subscriber.

Extraordinary Story of the Marquis of Bute.

A correspondent of the Perthshire Advertiser writes as follows concerning the Marquis of Bute: "I read so many anecdotes in the newspapers regarding the liberality of this nobleman to the head of the Catholic faith, the monastic buildings of their worship, his generosity to German shippers in Welch ports, etc., that I am surprised they have not heard of a romantic and rather affecting incident that occurred in his earlier years. The story, which has often been told to me in Rothesay, in quarters well-informed, is that the late Marchioness of Bute, on her deathbed, had her boy, to whom she was passionately attached, brought to her bedside, and there told the story of her sister and his aunt, Lady Flora Hastings, how she was 'done to death by slanderous tongues,' and then and there, beside his dying mother's couch, he was asked to promise, when he grew to manhood, never to frequent or go near the English Court during the present reign. The impulsive boy unfortunately promised. The anecdote has some collateral evidence in support of its accuracy. When the Queen, some twenty years ago, in the royal yacht, lay some time in Rothesay Bay, on the way to the head of Loch Long, no communication passed between the royal yacht and Mountstuart House. On the contrary, it was remarked that during the anchorage in the bay, the Marchioness had all the blinds at the windows in Mountstuart House pulled down."

Sambo's Religious Distinctions.

Mr. Dickson, a colored barber in one of the largest towns of Massachusetts, was one morning shaving one of his customers, a respectable citizen, when a conversation occurred between them respecting Mr. Dickson's former connection with a colored church in the place. "I believe you are connected with the church in Elm street, Mr. Dickson?" said the customer. "No, sah, not at all." "Why, are you not a member of the African church?" "Not dis year, sah." "Why did you leave their communion, Mr. Dickson, if I may be permitted to ask?" "Why, I tell you, sah," said Mr. Dickson, strapping a concave razor on the palm of his hand, "it was jess like dis: I jined dat church in good fait. I gib ten dollars toward de stated preachin' ob de Gospel de fuss year, and de people all call me Brudder Dickson. De second year my business not good, and I only gib five dollars. Dat year de church people call me Mr. Dickson. Dis razor hurt you, sah?" "No, sir, goes tolerably well." "Well, sah, de third year I feel perry poor—sickness in my family—an' I gib noffin for preachin'." Well, sah, arter dat dey call me Ole Nigger Dickson, and I leff 'em!" So saying, Mr. Dickson brushed his customer's hair, and the gentleman departed, well satisfied with the reason why Mr. Dickson left his church.

— At the publication of each new edition of Webster, the average newspaper editor esteems it a Christian duty to reproduce the following paragraph: "It is a singular circumstance that the word 'unabridged' is not in the latest edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary." It is an equally singular circumstance that some few hundreds of other words with the prefix "un" are not in that work, and for a reason which the reader will find very fully set forth in the work itself, and which is perfectly obvious to a man of sense anyhow. But this is only preliminary to what we set out to say, and we now approach our subject with a feeling of deep religious humility, as of one who feels his incompetence to do justice to it. The average newspaper editor is a Cheese! Music: "With verdure clad."

— We have received the following communication, which is exactly suited to our columns: "MR. EDITOR—I am a new hand at writing, but if the following is any use to you, please accept it, and say it is from the costic pen of John J. Davis, of Oakland, a gentleman well known as one of the profoundest thinkers and most brilliant literaters west of the Rocky Mountains. Say also, that for deep resirch and keen suggestiveness it stands peerless as a satire." The other part of Mr. Davis' article we are reluctantly compelled to decline.

— At the next meeting of the Congregational Club, says the Pacific, the Rev. J. Rowell will open discussion on recent theories respecting the state of the wicked after death. We trust the Rev. J. will touch upon the most recent theory of all—the one now for the first time promulgated by ourselves, namely, that the state of the wicked after death is very greatly preferable to the state of some of the pious in this life. It may not be so comfortable, but it is more honorable.

— Mr. John Hodge, having departed his nose, will pay a liberal reward for that feature, dead or alive. It may be identified by comparing the marks upon it with the teeth of J. McCarthy, Esquire. Mr. Hodge says it is of no value to any one but the owner, and a certain sow of cadaverous aspect thinks, with a quiet twinkle of her cold grey eye, that it is not of much value to him. All of San Mateo.

Oregon Wool and Real Estate.

The first shipment of spring clip of Oregon Wool arrived this week, and was attended with an unexpected mark of attention on the part of our web-footed neighbors. We all know how very much real estate has increased in value in Oregon in consequence of Ben Holladay's railroad project. The wool growers have affectionately enclosed in each bale, weighing about two hundred pounds, sixty pounds of natural earth, not taken up by the fleece, but shoveled in by the hard hands of the honest Oregonian wool-grower. If the shipments continue to arrive in the same condition, a valuable town lot will have been transported from Portland to San Francisco, but with the natural prejudice of Californians against outside lands, they are stupid enough to prefer wool in their bales.

— Speaking of the Rev. Mr. Williams, of Oakland, the Churchman remarks: "We are pained above expression to note the fact that his sickness took the form of insanity, of a serious character. Some days since, in consequence, he was removed to Stockton. It has cost us great pain to write this item." It only remains for the Churchman to explain that it costs the remorseful editor considerable pain to write any item as grammatical as the above, and as generally gratifying to sinners.

— A religious gentleman in Germany has bequeathed a handsome sum to a church, upon condition that his body shall be embalmed, crucified and stuck up conspicuously in the organ loft. It is said that the vestrymen decline, but it is only justice to explain that their refusal applies to the body, and not to the bequest. The reason of their objecting at all probably is, that it would cost more than the sum bequeathed, to embalm the gentleman's cadaver.

— At a point on Licking river in Kentucky, there is said to be a fog all the year round, says an exchange. If this turn out to be true, we shall probably hear no more from our Pioneers about our own "finest climate in the world, sir." But perhaps the favored Kentucky locality has not the advantage of an unailing cold wind, like that enjoyed by this cheerful peninsula. There should be an investigation.

— The Bulletin corrects a statement it had made, to the effect that at the time sentence was passed upon Laura Fair, a man was ejected from the Court-room for attempting to press forward and tender her his sympathy. The correction places the conduct of the ejecting officer in a rather bad light, for it now appears that the man meditated no graver offense than to offer violence to the prisoner.

— A young lady of our acquaintance—a downy little biped, who is always associated in our mind with diluted rose-water spilled over an underdone custard—wishes to know why we write such perfectly horrid sentiments. It is to keep the fatty-headed immaculates who take you to floral festivals from claiming them as their own productions, Dimity. And it works nicely.

— The telegraph announces that the Emperor of Germany has decided the dispute about the Island of San Juan, in favor of the United States. We don't know whether the telegraph has transmitted this gratifying decision before it was rendered, or the Emperor has decided the question before it was submitted to him. There is "enterprise" somewhere.

— A Philadelphia exchange relates how a lady in San Francisco applied for a divorce on the ground that her husband was a "confounded fool," and the Judge said that if that plea were allowed, every man who married would be liable to the same imputation.

— While undergoing the insignificant punishment of death by hanging, one Rufus of New York was observed in the last struggle to endeavor to place his hand in his pocket. During life his great desire was to place his hands in other people's pockets.

— A religious weekly says the word "Science" is used to designate more "stuff" than any word in the language. Except "Theology," perhaps, which is never used to designate anything else.

—We are shocked and grieved to note in one of the Call's editorials an expression that ill comports with its profession of uniform propriety. We think the editor owes it to his twenty thousand readers to apologize for so glaring an insult to their respectability. Its readers may not have as much book education as some, but they are good, honest, hard working people, who pay their taxes and vote as they are told; and it is an outrage to send into their families a journal containing so atrocious a sentence as the one to which we allude. It makes but little difference that the debasing sentiment is clothed in Sanscrit words, the natural acuteness of the workman will ferret out the hideous meaning, and he will spurn the vile sheet containing it from his humble door. Hardy sons of toil, bone and sinew of the land, hope of our country, will you permit the minds of your females and young to be poisoned day after day by a newspaper that brazenly proclaims Cum grano salis? Nay, more: will you longer patronize a journal which prints communications signed by the infamous "Pro Bono Publico," and displays long screeds—yes, screeds!—from the pen of the incendiary "Veritas"? We should not be surprised at any time to see your fathers-in-law insulted by the statement that Labor omnia vincit! Subscribe for the News Letter. Subscribe, O, subscribe!

Molly's Letter.

DEAR OLD NEWS LETTER:—June is a dull month. Everybody that is rich goes away to the country, for railroads leading to pleasanter places abound, and everybody wants to be in the fashion. So mater-familias persuades her husband to rent a little uncomfortable shanty in a patch of forlorn shrubbery, and takes the children there, and the father foregoes his comfortable dinner every day, and puts on a duster on Saturday evenings to go off and join the wife of his bosom till Monday morning at an unseemly hour, returning with a gnawing sensation at his stomach, occasioned by bad cooking, and aggravated by a rustic diet of fruit and milk. So the town is dull. The event of the week has been the closing exercises of Mme. Zeitska's Institute, at Pacific Hall. There was nothing to pay, so I went. We were requested by a polite note, printed in violet colored type, and headed by a violet colored monogram, to be there at seven, but the schoolmarm kept us waiting till eight. However, as everybody came early and the hall was crammed, it was good fun to see the people. There was no mistaking the mothers. In fact, the mothers took care that they should be identified. An anxious, unsettled, satisfied look, and a standing up to look at other mothers, joined to audible admonitions to minor olive branches, not to be asking after Bella, or Mary, or Mathilda, who were in the dressing-room, sufficiently impressed every one in the vicinity with the fact that "my daughter" was going to astonish the seven or eight hundred there assembled. At eight o'clock there was a hum of "here they are" and a solemn man, who looked like a Sheriff's officer, led a string of vestals up the middle aisle. They, with the exception of the Sheriff, were all dressed in white, and showed themselves all over the orchestra. The exercises were as they always are, unanimously harmless, and insipidly correct. Some young ladies warbled, some spoke little essays, full of moral adjectives, joined to mild nouns. The main object appeared to be the exhibition of the Sullivan family. I don't scruple to mention the name, as out of the twenty pieces, including the chorus, it appeared nine times in the printed programme. It was rich also to see the professors. There was the professor of dancing, airily flitting about to find seats for mammas with growing families. There was the drawing-master, who had got up an art exhibition in a corner, and was pointing out the beauties of those well-known crayon drawings, where the eyes are preternaturally large and dark, and the necks have glandular developments approaching to goitre, and landscapes that always have a water-mill in them, and impossible perspectives. The professors of philosophy, philology, and modern and extinct science, were all there with bald heads and profound looks. In short, Mme. Zeitska spared nothing for effect. And yet I doubt much if all this is good for the girls. What I blamed in that charlatan, Hager, I condemn in this. This public exhibition of girlhood destroys that innate modesty which should be cherished, and is so beautiful a feature. Vanity comes soon enough to us all, God help us, without its being fostered by popular applause, which, after all, is given more from kindness than to merit. It may be a good advertisement for the school, with weak, silly mothers, but as regards myself, it would deter me from sending my child, so you see that I do not consider myself either weak or silly. But I have written too much on this subject. Have mercy upon us miserable sinners, mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa, we say every Sunday, according as we are Papist or Heretic, and having given our conscience a bath, we return refreshed on Monday to our darling sins. The Squire of San Pablo has built an altar to his patron Saint in the church of the Extorted Donations. From the time of Cain, who inaugurated this species of erection, to the present day such has been the customary propitiatory offering. The same thing is acted in society when a secretary is bribed to send out an invitation to a great man's feast, but the invited one is but an intruder after all, and not a guest. The pet banker of crowned heads is going to visit his clientelle in Europe. How impertinently magnificent Rothschild's boy will be in his absence. The Zentimo came into port yesterday, and the echo of her big guns woke up the sleepy echoes of San Rafael. The unransomed one came by an early train, to renew the assurances of her distinguished consideration. Yours,

MOLLY.

— In a sermon last Sunday, at Oakland, the Rev. Mr. Hamilton made some judicious remarks relative to the efficacy of praying upon an empty stomach. Mr. Hamilton's belief, as nearly as we can make it out, is that a petition put up from a gastric vacuum is about twice as likely to be attended to as one sent forth from a full belly. This principle has long been acted upon in morning prayers, and grace before meat, but is grossly disregarded in evening devotion. Mr. Hamilton said: "In order to be of the highest efficiency, prayer must key up its faith by fasting, which unloads the soul of the heaviness of surfeited appetites and sodden senses. Spiritual vision is ever dim, and spiritual force is ever weak, in a clogged body." We have ever held that the soul is but another name for the stomach, and it affords us a pious satisfaction to be supported in this view by so eminent an authority as the Rev. Mr. Hamilton. When a good Christian prays to have his soul supplied with the bread of life, he begs figuratively for that which can be only literally bestowed. It is probable that this form of petition was originally used with an intent to deceive, by those who wished to convey the impression that they were fasting, so that their prayer might be the more efficacious. The soul being merely the stomach, it follows that Theology is to a great extent a knowledge of purgatives, and divine service properly conducted would consist chiefly in administering cathartics to the faithful. This is what the pious Shakespeare intended to encourage when he said, "Throw physic to the dogs!"

Our European Reflex.

France is drifting, whither who can tell? Like a vessel that will not obey her helm, with a mutinous crew and powerless captain, she is at the mercy of the wild waves, and may become the property of any one strong enough to take command and steer her with a firm hand. That France hardly knows what she wants is evidenced by the contradictory votes of the nation, as for example those of February and April last. Then the nation was for a republic; to-day, certainly, an immense majority of the country population and a considerable portion of the cities favor a monarchy. France is half monarchic and half republican. The priests support the throne, but it is questionable if their aid does not rather tend to weaken the government it would uphold. Recent horrible disclosures, which the late rebellion in Paris has brought to light, have created a bitter feeling against the clergy. Fifteen skeletons of young women, in attitudes of agony, found in a cell near the crypt of St. Laurent, leading to a dreadful suspicion of most foul wrong having been committed, succeeded by a like horror in the Church of Notre Dame des Victoires at Paris. The church was closed by order of the municipality, and subsequently opened by commissioners, consisting of members of the Town Council, medical men and the Chiefs of Police. Already several corpses have been disinterred. In a cell by the side of the altar articles of jewelry and silver were found, together with the head of a woman having long fair hair. In another, the bodies of four other recently buried women were found. In another cell two gold bracelets were discovered, and on the wall the marks of a woman's arm who wore a bracelet, the wall having evidently been struck while the plaster was wet. Four priests have been arrested, and public indignation is very great. The revolt of Paris, with its fury and bloodshed, has been the means of unearthing these evidences of silent crime. The Orleans Princes are at Versailles, and predictions are rife that one will mount the throne and once more attempt to maintain a constitutional monarchy. In other parts of Europe strange combinations are taking place. It is said that an alliance has been formed between Greece, Roumania, Servia and Egypt, with the connivance of Russia, for the purpose of dismembering Turkey. This accounts for the friendly and cordial terms that last power has lately been reported to be on with Russia, and for the sudden popularity of Prince Charles of Roumania with his subjects, for the same northern power that fomented discord could also excite the contrary sentiment. The Belgian government has issued a manifesto declaring that it regards the authors of the late Paris rebellion as malefactors, and as such not entitled to the protection commonly afforded to political refugees. This is as it should be. The census of London has just been taken, and the report shows the population to be 3,247,621, against 2,803,989 in 1861; being an increase in ten years of 443,642, or more than the population of California and Oregon together. The Greek government has decreed ten thousand pounds sterling to Mrs. Lloyd, whose husband was killed by the brigands at Marathon. The result of the winning of the Derby by Baron Rothschild's "Favonius" was known in Bombay four minutes after the occurrence.

— Some native Californians lassoed a grizzly bear the other day, near Los Angeles, weighing nine hundred pounds. This reminds us of a strikingly similar adventure of our own. With the reader's permission we will relate it, speaking of ourself (to avoid the first person) as Col. Cremony, who is an excellent hunter, loves a joke, and will pardon the liberty. Cremony was hunting bears in the hills back of Oakland, with a good strong riata, when he came upon one whose weight could not be accurately determined, but who appeared much larger than he was expected to. The Colonel advanced to cast the noose. Bear sat still. Colonel stopped and whirled his riata threateningly. Bear stuck up his head and shut his eyes. Colonel adjusted the noose to slip more easily. Bear held up one paw. Colonel whirled again. Bear did nothing. Colonel looped the end of his thong tightly about his left wrist. Bear sat up like a statue, and smiled a smile of resignation. Colonel threw the noose a little way to try it, and jerked it back. Bear got down and walked slowly toward him. Colonel retired, so as to preserve a good throwing distance, whirling menacingly. Bear trotted. Colonel whirled once, wildly, and then spread out the noose on the ground, taking an additional turn of the other end about his wrist. Bear came forward, took the riata in his paws, placed the noose about his neck, tightened it, lay down and shut his eyes. Colonel fished out a sheath knife, severed the line between himself and the bear, and came over to the city by the five o'clock boat. Thanking the Colonel for the use of his name, we conclude by proudly asserting that no bear in California can stop our progress when we have made up our mind to go away.

Love is Clean.

Let lips be red, for God has said
Love is like one gold-garmented,
And made them so for such a time,
Therefore let lips be red, therefore
Let love be ripe in ruddy prime,
Let hope beat high, let hearts be true,
And you be wise thereat, and you
Drink deep, and ask not any more.

Let red lips lift, proud curl'd, to kiss,
And round limbs lean and raise and reach
In love too passionate for speech,
Too full of blessedness and bliss
For anything but this and this;
Let luscious lips lean hot to kiss
And swoon in love, while all the air

Is redolent with balm of trees,
And mellow with the song of bees,
While birds sit singing everywhere;
And you will have not any more
Than I in boyhood, by that shore
Of olives, had in years of yore.

Let the unclean think things unclean;
I swear tip-toed, with lifted hands,
That we were pure as sea-wash'd sands,
That not one coarse thought came between Believe or disbelieve who will,
Unto the pure all things are pure;
As for the rest, I can endure
Alike their good will or their ill.

—Joaquin Miller.

Murder !

If any one of our readers is meditating a murder, unless there is some private reason or pressing necessity for its immediate commission, our advice to him is to postpone it. The present is about the most unfavorable season for murderers that we remember to have noted since the discovery of justifiable homicide and the invention of temporary insanity. Within the past few months, the sheriffs, all over the country, have been kept wholesomely busy stretching the criminal neck, and there is sufficient prepared material on hand to keep them going for some months longer. In short, the long-prayed-for reaction has set in, and the danger now is that capital punishment will be overdone; though, God be praised, the overdoing will be an error upon the right side! But if the present healthy and judicious hanging shall assume an abnormal and indiscriminate character, there will as certainly be a reaction in the contrary direction as there has been in this. After all, this matter seems to be as rigidly subject to the law of periodicity as is everything else; and probably the utmost we can hope for is that advantage may be taken of the present public sentiment, to impose restrictions upon the action of the inevitable opposite one. By some judicious amendments to our criminal laws—particularly those relating to evidence—we may reap some lasting advantages from this temporary turn of the tide. For it is to the rules concerning the admissibility of evidence that we may most effectually apply our reformatory acuteness. These rules are based principally upon precedents, and as a great many of these had their origin in the period of lenity just passed, they will materially hamper the free justice of that upon which we are entering, unless they shall be "disestablished" at once and forever. The plea of temporary insanity, which is practically a growth of the last dozen years, should be hereafter disallowed, and all evidence tending to support it should be rigidly excluded by special statute. The plea is in itself so monstrous, and in its effect so dangerous to the life of the citizen, that it is a matter of astonishment that any attorney was ever permitted to set it up. It is false to say that it is used merely as a pretext to permit the escape of a defendant whose actual justification is something else; or at least it is false to say that it is always so used. The evidence upon this point—baldly ridiculous as it invariably is—does in many cases really mislead a jury, and secure an iniquitous acquittal. That attorneys know this—and they are in a position to judge—is clear from the trouble they take to present it strongly and in overwhelming volume. If juries required only a pretext, a bare hint would be as efficacious as a mass of evidence. We honestly believe that, in cases of conceded or proven killing, outside of the necessary defense of person or property, justice would be more nearly perfectly administered by not allowing the prisoner to make any showing as to motive. The proof of the killing should close the case, and defendant should be promptly hanged. We are not of those who believe it is better for ninety and nine guilty to escape than for one innocent to swing—except in the limited sense that it is better for them. The life of an individual is of small account as compared with the security of life generally. Now we are not averse to murder, properly restricted. We believe there are circumstances in which a man is justified in deliberately and coolly taking the life of another; but he is justified only if he is willing to surrender his own. With this equitable limitation, we think the right to murder may be safely conceded to all. But after bravely availing himself of his legal privilege, no man should be permitted to perpetrate the cowardice of making a defense. Some method of punishing jurors who bring in verdicts contrary to the evidence is also a desideratum, but there are certain difficulties in the way of determining their guilt, which require for their final removal a separate article.

— That is a very stale joke about the horse that threw a minister, and was then complimented upon having assisted in spreading the Gospel; but seeing its familiar face in a newspaper suggests the reflection that the average person does not depend upon a horse to assist him in the good work. He is so entirely self-reliant that he employs only a donkey.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

— There is at present a fair degree of activity in business circles, there being a great number of small transactions. The Commercial Herald says our wholesale jobbers and dealers in groceries, drugs, dry goods, liquors, wines, etc., all report satisfactorily concerning business prospects; and the most of our merchants are exceedingly hopeful as to the future of the Pacific slope. The country appears to be all astir with life and animation. The amount of travel was never so great as now, be it on land or water. Our coasting steamers to Oregon and northern ports are scarcely able to carry all the freight and passengers that offer; and the same remark will apply to San Diego and the southern coast trade. The numerous small steamers now plying coastwise have not only increased the number of their trips, but rates of passage and freight have been largely reduced, thus inviting travel and stimulating the carrying trade to an extent far beyond the most sanguine anticipations of the masses. The amount of country produce now arriving coastwise, consisting of flour, grain, wool, wine, etc., is astonishingly great, and is but the forerunner of what may be expected within the next decade. As to the vast carrying trade now being developed by the Central and Union Pacific Railroads, it already exceeds the expectations of our people; yet what will it be when other railroads now projected shall be completed, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company shall run semi-monthly their 6,000 ton steamers to China and Japan! These, and the Australian steamships, all bringing vast numbers of passengers and freight for transmission by rail over the continent, with the promise of liberal harvests, and the natural increase of our flocks, herds, etc., assure us of a great and important future to which we are rapidly attaining.

— The General Freight Agent of the Central Pacific Railroad Company furnishes the following statement of the amount of through freight (in pounds) passed over the road to the East during May:

Tea.....	182,152	Shingles, No.....	302,000
Cotton (foreign).....	25,375	Fish.....	27,967

Hops.....	8,411	Stock, car loads.....	4
Lumber, feet.....	52,692	Unspecified.....	1,424,101

The total is the largest of any month since the completion of the road. Over nine-tenths of the freight was sent from this city. The shipments from other points embrace 900 lbs. wine and 6,400 lbs. unspecified freight from San José; 4,570 lbs. leather and 2,697 lbs. unspecified freight from Stockton; 24,798 lbs. wine, 256,592 lbs. wool, 8411 lbs. hogs, 156,104 lbs. unspecified freight, and all the live stock, lumber and shingles, from Sacramento; 1,114 lbs. wine, 40,000 lbs. machinery, and 2,963 lbs. unspecified freight, from Marysville.

— The Rocky Mountain Coal companies have recently reduced their mining expenses materially, promising increased supplies in the future at reduced prices. The recent discoveries of Coal deposits on the Aleutian Islands will add new sources of supply to our market. The Coal has been analyzed, and shown to be of a superior quality: Geologists assert that the deposits are the oldest yet discovered on the coast. It can be delivered here and sold wholesale at $6 per ton.

"Charge."

SEDAN, 1870.

Trumpeters, call for order of fight.

Place your divisions by bank and trench,
Much shall be done ere the fall or night:

There come the Prussians—here stand the French.
A burst of smoke along the lines,

A rattle and roll and a roar of guns;
And death to the man that shrinks, and shuns
His ordered path on the rough inclines!

Here, on the hill by La Garenne,
See the hosts of the French arrayed:
They are Soldiers, and they are Men;
Who shall make them afraid!

Cuirassiers, prepare, for the Germans
Scatter our infantry up the height:
Yea, for all their prayers and sermons,
They know how to fight!

Hark—the mouths of the guns, as they rattle, cry,
"Death looms horrible, dark, and large"—
Dare them! "Vive la France!" for your battle-cry:

CHARGE!

A dash of the hoofs, and a whirl of plumes,
A "vive" from the Foot as they thunder by,
A roar of cheers from the Cuirassiers,
And the blades flash out like flames on high.
The rider laughs, and the charger fumes,
Each with the fire of blood in his eye;
There are no fears for the Cuirassiers!
They know how to die.

And here they are met
With bayonets set,
And flank and rear with bullet and shell;
Not only at front
Is the battle's brunt,
There's a thinning of inner ranks, as well;
And, hot and hard,
It is thrust and guard,
Slay as they can, be slain if they must:
Horse and man
To press to the van,
And churn with their teeth the gore and dust;
Thus they close
With an army of foes,
With neither space nor the will to swerve,
Stern and fast,
Each man to the last,
With quivering steel and iron of nerve;
Till battered, and shelled,
And foiled, and felled,
Tens by tens they dwindle—they fall;
Heap on heap
Death grips them with sleep,
And scarce a man lives of the ranks of them all!

The end is at hand. This misty heat
Of wrath and ruin inflames our sight;
Our hearts are hot, our pulses fleet,
We cannot perceive, or judge aright.
Yet it shall be, that when Time brings
The cool that lies in the fan of his wings,
And the rolling away of dark from light;
And when the age's pitiful things,
The hates of peoples, the scorn of kings,
Succumb to his passionless might;
Men shall not fret of the wrong or right—
That is lost in the long gone by—
They shall say, the German—He knew how to fight:
The Frank—He knew how to die.

— In the Police Court, a man has been sentenced for hammering a woman with a rocking-chair. That man is a beast! A rocking-chair! The thing in which his own mother lulled his infant soul to sleep—about which cling all tender memories, as bats cluster upon a stalagmite—whose arms are sacred, whose back revered, whose legs hallowed, whose bottom—ah! it was cruel to put the entire anatomy of a rocking-chair to so vile a use as beating a woman with it; when an ordinary three-legged stool would have hurt her just as bad!

Every Man His Own Gas Maker--Maxim Gas Company.

For a number of years attempts have been made, with more or less success, to supply light from gas made from various substances, as oil, fat, resin, or resinous woods, by limited apparatus, in hotels or other buildings remotely situated. The results, on the whole, may be considered as failures from the trouble involved, and the general public being not sufficiently skilled to properly manipulate the apparatus. Since the introduction of petroleum, however, the difficulties have been much lessened, and various devices have been offered by which from gasoline, a volatile product of petroleum, a brilliant light might be obtained. Some 200 patents have been issued for different methods of evolving the vapor mixed with common air for the purposes of illumination. The difficulties which constantly attend the development of a new idea have, however, interfered with, in a greater or a less degree, these efforts to attain the great desideratum. At length, it would appear, the enigma has been solved, and the object so long sought has been obtained, viz: a portable gas machine, so simple in operation as to offer no difficulties to the uninitiated, requiring but little attention, and combining economy, reliability, and safety, with a brilliancy of light superior to the coal gas usually in use. The Maxim Gas Company, who have accomplished this, have their offices situated at 315 Pine street, where Mr. Clark, the manager, may be found, willing to afford every information. Experiment having demonstrated the success of the Maxim method to such men in New York as Mark Sheldon, J. B. Thomas, Asa Lawton, Frank Randall, etc., the company was incorporated. These gentlemen have sold the patent right to the Pacific States and Territories to a company, of whom J. O. Eldridge, Wm. H. Ladd, Josiah Moulton, Phillip Meagher, and others, are the officers. Already the Maxim Gas apparatus is in use by, and to the entire satisfaction of the following gentlemen: James Gamble, Esq., Superintendent Western Telegraph Company; M. J. O'Connor, Esq., of Conroy & O'Connor, San Rafael; George Walkington, Esq., Piedmont Springs; George H. Howard, Esq., San Mateo; J. H. Redington, Esq., Oak Grove; H. A. Bloss, Esq., Dining Hotel, Lathrop Station, W. P. R. R.; Cosmopolitan Hotel, San Francisco; Tamalpais Hotel, San Rafael, Mills' Institute. Numerous other orders are in course of execution. From an exhaustive pamphlet on the subject, issued by the company, and to which we refer our readers for full details, we gather that the cost is only one-third that of coal gas, charged $5 per thousand. The price of an apparatus is, for thirty lights, $400; for fifty lights, $500; for 100 lights, $800. It affords us pleasure to call attention to this invention, as developing another source of industry, affording employment to many men, and adding to the comfort and convenience of the community.

— Professor Dramer conducted a side-show in the wake of a horse opera, and the same sojourned at Colusa. Enters unto the side show a powerful young man of the Colusa sort, and would see his money's worth. Blandly and with conscious pride the Professor directs the young man's attention to his fine collection of living snakes. Litely the black snake uncoils in his sight. Voluniously the bloated boa convulses before him. All horrent the cobra exalts his hooded head, and the spanning jaws fly open. Quivers and chitters the tail of the cheerful rattlesnake; silently slips out the forked tongue, and is as silently absorbed. The fangless adder warps up the leg of the Professor, lays clammy coils about his neck, and pokes a flattened head curiously into his open mouth. The young man of Colusa is interested; his feelings transcend expression. Not a syllable breathes he, but with a deep-drawn sigh he turns his broad back upon the astonishing display and goes thoughtfully forth into his native wild. Half an hour later might have been seen that brawny Colusan, emerging from an adjacent forest with a strong faggot. Not the least obeisance made he—not a moment stopped or stayed he—but with a singleness of purpose and a rapt attention to detail that would have done credit to a lean porker garnering the strewn kernels behind a deaf old man who plants his field with corn, he started in upon that reptilian host, and exterminated it with a careful thoroughness of extermination. Then this Colusa young man unto the appalled Professor thus: "Ther ain't no good place yer in Kerloosy fur fittin' out and equippin' serpence to be subter than all the beasts o' the field. Ther's enmity atween our seed and ther seed, an' it shell brooze ther head. Sluice my gizzard, ef I ain't half a mind to go fur yer owt crust! Stranger—git!" The Professor got, and the strong young man strode silently away. There is but little to add: Public sentiment in Colusa is unfavorable to snaix.

— Preliminary to deposing the Rev. Mr. Cheney, of Chicago, from the Ministry, Bishop Whitehouse divested his sorrowing soul of some extremely apt remarks. Among other things, he said: "There rises up before us the strange wreck of the after life of this our brother, who voluntarily goes out from among us." It is fearful to think, even at this distance, of this proud ecclesiastical craft, sailing lightly out of the still waters of the Episcopal haven, and going to eternal smash upon the rocks of mental freedom; thenceforth to welter a melancholy bulk in the unquiet billows of a layman's existence! The overstrained imagination gives way, and becomes as limp and imbecile as a dish-clout, in the effort to conceive the deep debasement of the wretch who is not permitted to preach the Gospel according to St. Pusey. It is just awful!

Court Chat.

— The arms of Sir John Herschel, says the Court Journal, deserve a notice at the present moment. The first astronomer of the name, Sir William, was a German oboe player in the King's private band. He received encouragement from his royal master in the prosecution of the astronomical studies to which he had devoted his leisure, and eventually discovered the uttermost planet but one yet known in the solar system. He named it after his patron "Georgium Sidus," and was knighted and a coat of arms granted to him, which not only celebrated his discovery, but also emblazoned on the shield the instrument with which it was made. These arms were granted as an honor to the astronomer, and a disgrace to the so-called science of heraldry, which is worthy of better things: "Argent on a mount vert, a forty feet reflecting telescope with its apparatus, proper, on a chief, azure, the astronomical symbol of Georgium Sidus irradiated, or; crest, a demi-terrestrial globe, on which an eagle is standing with his wings elevated, or; motto, Cælis exploratis."

— The Lord Chamberlain has, says the Court Journal, laid his interdict upon the performance of certain pieces, among others, of Le Supplice d'une Femme, Paul Forestier, and Julie. His Lordship is to be complimented, and we hope that with the influx of foreigners (most heartily and sympathetically welcomed, we shall all have the moral courage and good sense to set our faces dead against any attempt to introduce their levity and license of life. The moral of the past few months and of the painful present hour cannot fail to be read.

— The Emperor Napoleon, says the Court Journal, has purchased Hooton Hall, the late residence of R. C. Naylor, Esq. A number of years ago, the Emperor, when Prince Napoleon, visited this country, and stayed at Hooton Hall for a short time, and hunted with the staghounds. Before his departure, he expressed his appreciation of the hall, and intimated that he would like to reside there. Fortune seems kind to the wishes of the great, and has enabled His Majesty to realize his.

— It is whispered at Copenhagen that there is some idea of a marriage between one of the English Princes and the Danish Princess Thyra, who is now in her 18th year. The Queen of Denmark and the Princess left the capital about the beginning of June for Rumpenheim, in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, where they were to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales, and other members of the Royal Family of England.

— The King and Queen of Spain continue to make a most favorable impression on their new subjects. They have given orders that no petition directed to them is to be neglected. At this moment 10,000 cases of distress are entered on the books at the Palace for inspection and report, and the almoners have $5,000 cash in hand to disburse, with the intimation that more will be forthcoming when that is spent.

— There is a proposal, now that holiday-making is increasing once more in "merry England," that some attention and study should be given to the art of well employing holidays. Some men at the head of London life, of the best class, intend to call a meeting seriously to consider the art of merry-making. There is good intent and wisdom in the proceeding.

— A rumor is current in London of a project which, if carried into effect, will enable tourists of limited means to pay a visit to America this season. It is said that the Great Eastern steamship will be fitted up to take two thousand persons on a pleasure trip to the United States, and that the fare over will be five pounds only.

— A distinguished London amateur, who treats his friends to the very finest professional music that plenty of money and a discriminating love of art enable him to procure, has one peculiarity—namely, that to these treats he never invites ladies, simply from the idea that their too ample dresses "absorb the sound."

— The Court Journal says: An approaching marriage in high life nearly eight feet high, has been rumored and communicated to us—namely, that of the pretty Nova Scotia giantess, Miss Swan, with the Kentucky giant, Captain Van Buren Bates, who appeared for the first time at Willis' Rooms on Monday.

— Mdlle. Carreno, the handsome young Spanish pianist, now in London, has announced a matinée in a private residence, next week. This gifted young musician has had the honor of giving a recital at Apsley House before a select circle, including Sir Michael Costa.

— The Emperor of Germany has purchased of Prince Thurn and Taxis a large estate in Posen, in order to hand it over to Prince Bismarck as a slight token of his gratitude. The estate pays 120,000 thalers annual rent, about £18,000 a year.

— Baron Rothschild was so enthusiastically surrounded and cheered on winning the Derby that the assistance of six policemen was necessary to rescue him from the mob of admirers.

— Her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to name Wednesday, the 21st of June, for the opening of the new St. Thomas' Hospital.

— The cotton crop now arriving at the cotton ports of the South promises to be the largest since the famous one of 1859-60.

Our Letters.

Away, to all the world, they go—our letters—
 To mighty London, melancholy Paris,
 To Pekin, Boston—welcome to the getters
 As is a baby to a man that marries;
 There, peradventure, held in paper fetters,
 An earnest of our wealth each missive carries,
 For thus the gold which issues from our shafts
 Is dissipated o'er the world by drafts.
 Hid in that bay repose a month's emotions,
 Repugnant billets slumber side by side—
 An order here, perhaps, for pills and potions,
 And here a requisition for a bride;
 All kinds of news, and narratives, and notions,
 A murder now, a marriage, suicide;
 Assertions, too, so hot, of love's attacks,
 One wonders that they do not melt the wax.
 Indulgent husbands, writing to their wives,
 Who could not bear the climate, and have gone
 Reluctantly away to save their lives,
 And those of darlings whom they dote upon,
 Now dolefully declare the hours are knives
 Which stab their faithful bosoms, and anon
 Must bring them to their graves—and then they hint
 That money's scarce, and they have not a mint.
 And then, their business done, their letters posted,
 These desolate disconsolates adjourn
 To dinner—say, a duck, divinely roasted—
 Which mitigates their sorrow and concern;
 And then, perhaps, a pretty barnmaid's toasted,
 In cliquot, which they quietly intern;
 And then some jolly dog proposes—such is Life—that they go at once to the Grand Duchess.

Theatrical.

The play of Honor, which has occupied the stage of the California Theater during the first part of the week, affords another instance that nec semper tendit arcem Apollo. Brongham's bow was indeed unstrung when it launched such an uncertain shaft. However, the piece, weak though it be, gave Mr. Adams a good opportunity to display his powers of impersonation as the twin brothers and the old Gipsy. Othello was given on Thursday evening, and was noticeable chiefly for the very admirable performance of the jealous Moor by Mr. McCullough, who may rank among the best representatives of the character. On Friday night the house was literally crammed by an audience pleased to testify their appreciation of Mr. McCullough as an artist, and kindly feeling toward him as a friend—for as such he is regarded by the play-goers of San Francisco. The benefit was a graceful compliment from Mr. Adams, and in keeping with that gentleman's well-known geniality and freedom from professional jealousy. The parts of "Damon" and "Pythias" were well suited to Messrs. McCullough and Adams, both in a professional and private sense, and consequently were acted with rare spirit. In the afterpiece of Black Eyed Susan Mr. Adams played the dashing sailor "William" in true shellback style, and was well supported by Mr. Raymond as "Gnatbrain," Mr. Mestayer as "Jacob Twig," Miss M. E. Gordon as "Susan" (a most interesting performance), and Miss Minnie Walton as "Dolly Mayflower," in which part that young lady's sprightliness and naïveté showed to great advantage. At the Alhambra, Mr. Purdy keeps his end up, and Emerson's comicalities are uproariously applauded. Signor Bideaux's fine baritone is a great acquisition to the vocal force of the establishment.

— The Young Men's Christian Convention, in Washington, decided that it was inexpedient to meddle with the question of the use of tobacco.—Exchange. [Several affluent delegates being engaged in the business, it was conceded that there might be an honest difference of opinion with regard to the effect of nicotine upon the human soul, but all could cordially unite in condemning the secular interference of the Internal Revenue Department.]

— Incarcerated in the San José jail for a term of seventy-five days, a San Francisco Hoodlum had languished out fifty days of his sentence, when he was pardoned by Governor Haight. We suppose if he had been sentenced to pay a fine of seventy-five cents the Governor would have remitted two-bits of it. The case is a striking illustration of how justice to a villain may be tempered with mercy to a voter.

The Toad.

Not only are toads harmless, they are absolutely and directly useful to us, perambulating our fields and gardens at night, and devouring vast quantities of injurious insects which could never be destroyed by the hand of man. The mode in which a toad takes his prey is very curious. The singularly beautiful eye of the toad is as quick as it is bright, and if within the range of its vision an insect or a grub should happen to move, the toad is sure to see it, and nearly certain to catch it. First, the toad holds its head as high as possible, so as to make sure of its prey, and then crawls slowly towards it, preferring to get under it if possible. When it is nearly within reach, it gazes intently at the insect, its mouth being gradually brought nearer and nearer. Something pink then flashes from its mouth, and the insect vanishes as if by magic. The pink flash is the tongue of the toad, which is formed in a rather curious way. The base of the tongue is fixed close to the front of the lower jaw, and is long and tapering, the tip pointing down the throat when it is at rest. When, however, it is used for catching prey, it is thrown out with a sort of "tick," and the tip, which is covered with a glutinous secretion, adheres to the insect, and conveys it down the toad's throat before the prey had time to make an effort for escape. When the toad swallows its prey, it does it with a mighty effort, during which the eyes almost disappear, the size of the insect having little to do with the vehemence of the demonstration. Sometimes, when a large beetle is swallowed, it does struggle, but too late, and for some time its struggles may be seen through the thin and ribless sides of its capturer: the toad, sitting the while in perfect composure, not in the least affected by the scratchings and kickings that are going on in its interior.—Rev. J. G. Wood, in Cassell's Magazine.

The Multiplication of Novels.

In walking along the sea-shore when a gentle breeze is blowing, and in watching the constant succession of waves, one may be reminded of the equally constant succession of novels. Each little wave comes up with such an important air, curls over, makes its roar and foam, and runs up the beach as if it were doing something that had never been done before and would hardly ever be done so well again. But before it has had time to sink back into obscurity, another wave is ready to follow it with the same little roar, the same little foam, and the same confidence that it also is doing something very wonderful and very new. Each tenth wave perhaps is somewhat justified in its conceit, for it runs up at least a yard or so above its rivals, and so for a moment draws the attention of those who are strolling along the beach. So it is with our novels. Their roar, their foam, or rather, we may say, their froth, is never-ending. Every day sees a fresh one, often two fresh ones, published. Not one of them knows what diffidence is. Each one, on the contrary, comes bursting on the world as if its froth were not the froth of yesterday, and as if it bore in itself something quite fresh, and not the old sands and mud that have been washed up again and again. It is scarcely possible to lose one's temper in watching this literary flood. Each author is so well satisfied with himself and with his little splash, and is so convinced that his readers will be equally well satisfied, that it is difficult to refuse one's sympathy and applause.

— The Young Men's Christian Associations in Ohio towns have appointed "smelling committees," whose duty it is to go about to the various gin mills and ascertain what bar-keepers sell liquor to habitual drunkards, with a view to prosecuting the offenders. From the number of that holy brotherhood that we have noticed hanging about the bar-rooms of this city drinking the liquor sold to habitual drunkards, we infer that similar committees have been organized here.

— A gentleman afflicted with a cancer wishes to learn from a literary weekly (the idea of learning anything from a literary weekly is, in itself, a tolerably good joke) if it is true that an infallible cure for this ailment has been discovered, as is claimed by the Alta. Yes; there is no doubt of it. Everybody who has tried the remedy has died directly, but you must not expect a new medicine to begin curing right off. These things require time to get to working properly.

Hard Times for Jurymen.

Much sympathy has been expended on the members of the jury in the Fair case, and there were some of the wives of the immortal twelve who agreed with the amiable Emily Pitts Stevens in the opinion that Judge Dwinelle acted like a veritable "tyrant" in that case. As a contrast to the course of Judge Dwinelle, we beg the fair Emily to contemplate the course of Judge Williams, of Melbourne, as described by the Melbourne Punch, in the following dialogue:

A Jurymen—Your Honor, the jury wish to retire for a few minutes. Some of them are very faint, as they took breakfast at an early hour.

His Honor Judge Williams—I'm very sorry, gentlemen, but we must get on. It's a long case, and we must finish it to-day. We cannot positively adjourn.

Punch's "paid poet," taking this dialogue as a text, rhymes thus:

Pity the sorrows of poor jurymen,
When by the acting Judge it is decreed,
That not one moment must they leave the box
To go in for a feed.
However famished those poor souls may be,
From taking breakfast at an early hour,
It stands to reason, when they feel so faint,
That they should look quite sour.
Because we know that empty innards will
Upon the wounded feelings work with ravage;
Stop a man's mid-day meal, and what results?
Why, he gets awful savage.
Upon the Judge they cannot vent their spleen
In being forced to go without their dinner;
So, ten to one, they lay the total blame
On the misguided sinner,
Who waits their verdict with a beating heart,
Wondering the while if he will come to grief.
Most likely; for the jury yearn to dash
At mutton, pork, or beef.
And what's the use of wasting time, you know?
Guilty, of course; ha! famished men can't wait—
It's wonderful what lack of grub will do
In fixing a man's fate.
On all accounts, for certain it is best
To have your jury perfectly at ease;
Let them at mid-day have ten minutes, and
A snack of bread and cheese.

Laughing at Jonathan.

The Alta doubts the authenticity of the anecdote that describes Von Moltke as indulging in ridicule of the strategy of the American armies during the civil war, and declaring that he had never studied the history of Grant's and Lee's campaigns "because nothing is to be learned from the confused scrambling of two armed mobs." Notwithstanding the Alta's skepticism, it is certain that the story has been widely circulated in the European as well as the American journals, and has never been contradicted. But the renowned German strategist is not alone in his contempt of American military prowess. Prince Bismarck seems fully to share it, and, according to the correspondence of the English papers, takes every occasion to express his sentiments on the subject. "Last week," says the London Court Journal of May 27th, "two bon mots against the Yankees by the Prince enlivened the jovial column of the Continental papers."

The Journal adds: "The ridicule with which the Prince so persistently assails the Americans is not a little singular. Surely he does not wish to pick a quarrel with Jonathan?"

We opine not. Both the blind General and the Prince have a right to entertain and express their opinions in regard to the strategy of our armies during the war, and Jonathan is not so silly as to find in such freedom of speech a casus belli.

"Marriage" and "Marry Age."

A young lady having received very urgent proposals of marriage from an old gentleman, sent the following answer:

Why thus urge me to compliance?

Why compel me to refuse?

Yet though I court not your alliance,

Perchance a younger I may choose;

For 'tis a state I'll ne'er disparage,

Nor will I war against it wage—

I do not, sir, object to marriage,

I but dislike to marry-age.

America and Australia--Our Sympathy Repudiated.

Our consuls in Australia are growing impatient at the disposition shown by the leading press of San Francisco to patronize and befriend them, under the supposition that they are the victims of oppression at the hands of a distant government, whose policy, "dictated by jealousy," is narrow-minded and selfish. The Australasian, alluding to this subject, says: "The interest which our American kinsfolk take in our supposed republican aspirations is quite touching; and the tender compassion they evince for our forlorn political condition betrays a warmth of feeling for which we suppose we ought to be grateful. But we wish that that remarkable people, which is so anxious to patronize and befriend us, and to make good republicans of us, would be at the pains to make themselves better acquainted with us and our institutions. Both in New York and in San Francisco the most ludicrous misconceptions prevail with respect to Australia. In the last batch of papers from California we alighted upon a leading article in a leading journal on the possible independence of these colonies, in which it was evidently assumed that we are governed from Downing street, and that we have taxation without representation, and that we have to submit to customs rates which may pour manufactured goods in upon us from the mother country without stint, and practically extinguish our own industries. Our readers will not require to be told that this is a tissue of ignorant misstatements. Even if there were a scintilla of truth in them, they would come with a singularly bad grace from such a quarter. For what is the position of California? It contains a population of half a million people, engaged mostly in agriculture, horticulture, wine making, mining, and commerce. All its customs duties are imposed by a legislature 3,000 miles off—a legislature under the control of certain rings composed of enormously wealthy manufacturers in the eastern States; and these duties operate most oppressively upon the producers of gold, silver, wheat, wine, and wool in California. True, that State is represented in both Houses of Congress, but its representatives are powerless against the wealthy combinations which engineer tariff bills through the national legislature." The Australian editor quite fails to perceive the advantages of an elected over a hereditary executive, and actually maintains that the government of the colonies will favorably compare with that of the States of the American Union. He insists that life and property are more secure in the colonies than in the States; that the laws are more justly and impartially administered, and that the standard of political morality is higher. We have no time at present to refute these outrageous propositions, and accordingly turn the job over to the intelligent notists of the Alta, whose patriotic zeal and proverbial intellectual prowess admirably qualify them for the task of demolishing the presumptuous antipodean journalist who ventures to promulgate such atrocious political heresies.

Speakers and Reporters.

The Echo says: "Lord Lyttelton has written to the Times to make eight corrections in the half-column report of his speech of Monday night. To his letter the Times appends the note: 'If our readers could but hear Lord Lyttelton speak, their only wonder would be that he could be reported at all.' To this we may add, that if our readers could but see Lord Lyttelton's writing, their wonder would be that the compositors could ever print his explanation." In a subsequent letter to another new-paper, Lord Lyttelton relates the following anecdotes to show that public speakers are at the mercy of reporters: "Mr. Cobden, during the short time he was in Parliament, incessantly abused the reporters (whom he always called 'reporters'; for not fully reporting him. The consequence was that they ended by not reporting him at all. The late Lord Montagu, when Mr. Spring Rice in the House of Commons once said something the reporters did not like, sent him a formal warning that, unless he publicly apologized, reported he should not be. He did not apologize, and reported he was not for two years. At last the spell was broken by Mr. Murray, the bookseller, starting a new paper called the Constitution (which nearly ruined him). To ingratiate himself with Mr. Rice he reported his speeches, whereupon the others gave in."

— We think the administration of justice might be much simplified by furnishing each cell in our city prison with a good stout rope, depending from a hook in the ceiling and fitted with a slip noose. There has lately been a strong tendency among the prisoners to avail themselves of the obvious advantages of hanging, and as that is a luxury unfeelingly denied them by juries, it ought to be accorded by the jailor. What are we saying? We mean it ought to be accorded to him.

The Deacon's Prayer.

In the regular evening meeting
 That the church holds every week,
 One night a listening angel sat
 To hear them pray and speak.
 It puzzled the soul of the angel
 Why some to that gathering came
 But sick and sinful hearts he saw,
 With grief and guilt aflame.
 They were silent, but said to the angel,
 "Our lives have need of him!" [pain,
 While doubt, with dull, vague, throbbing
 Stirred through their spirits dim.
 You could see 'twas the regular meeting,
 And the regular seats were filled,
 And all knew who would pray and talk,
 Though any one might that willed.
 From his place in front of the pulpit,
 In his long-accustomed way, [was sung,
 Where the Book was read, and the hymn
 The Deacon arose to pray.
 First came the long preamble—
 If Peter had opened so, [heard,
 He had been, ere the Lord his prayer had Full fifty fathoms below.
 'Twas the regular evening meeting,
 And the regular prayers were made,
 But the listening angel told the Lord
 That only the silent prayed.

Then a volume of information
 Poured forth, as if to the Lord,
 Concerning His ways and attributes,
 And the things by Him abhorred.
 But not in the list of the latter
 Was mentioned the mocking breath
 Of the hypocrite prayer that is not prayer,
 And the make-believe life in death.
 Then he prayed for the church and the pas-
 And that 'souls might be his hire'— [tor;
 Whatever his stipend otherwise—
 And the Sunday-school; and the choir;
 And the swarming hordes of India;
 And the perishing, vile Chinese; [Rome;
 And the millions who bow to the Pope of
 And the pagan churches of Greece;
 And the outcast remnants of Judah,
 Of whose guilt he had much to tell—
 He prayed, or he told the Lord he prayed,
 For everything out of Hell.
 Now, if all that burden had really
 Been weighing upon his soul, [side,
 'Twould have sunk him thro' to the China
 And raised a hill over the hole.

—William O. Stoddard.

— 'Twas summer's eye. We were ambling innocently along the sands of Oakland, noting curiously the habits of the lower animals—the lithe gopher, the cheerful chipmunk, the nimble squirrel, and the meditative Methodist—when our fine intellectual eye was arrested by a ponderous knapsack that attempted to pass between our feet. Atop of the moving knapsack was an enormous soldier cap, and, running up skyward, a ponderous musket barrel tipped with a bayonet—the whole resembling a heap of old clothes protected by a lightning rod. Balked in the attempt to pass between us, the knapsack executed a rapid evolution to the left oblique, changed front, advanced in echelon, halted, wavered wearily, and finally toppled over on its back and lay like a turtle overthrown. Then for the first we observed that it had legs, arms, a neck, and brass buttons like sauce plates all up and down its front. We moved cautiously away, and in half an hour returned with a native. "There," said we, pointing to the busu naturæ, "what's that?" "That!" replied the gentle savage, "why, that's a University Cadet, act. VII., on his way to recitation. Poor boy, he's gin out!"—and he stood him up. "Ruer," continued the barbarian, "canst thou construe Stultus?" "Yes," returned a thin voice from the depths of the soldier cap, "it's a University Regent." "And what, my gentle warrior," proceeded the native, "means Ignorare?" "That's to belong to the faculty," was the sepulchral but triumphant squeak. "And what is Miles?" "That's a soldier in the vocative, which is me," sadly returned the little man. "You spoke of the faculty, mine own citizen soldiery, what's them?" "Dam scilicet!" was the astounding reply. "Do you know the Greek alphabet, son o' Mars?" "If I had alpha show I'd beta long roll on their heads," said the son o' Mars, his mind still running on the faculty. So would we.

— On Tuesday last, Mr. J. M. Stripes found a bag of money at the corner of California and Sansome streets. He pounced upon it with avidity, he devoured it with glad and eager eyes, he silently thanked God for lifting him from penury to affluence! Then, with a calm, unruffled composure of soul, and a psalm of gratitude in his heart, he opened the bag. Seven dollars and six bits in copper cents! Mr. Stripes counted them over and then with a sigh replaced them in the bag and tied the string with unnecessary deliberation. Then he turned his eyes down hill and thought. He thought long and carefully. Quoth Stripes at last unto himself: "I think I'll return this damn thing to the owner." Stripes did it, and lo! the newspapers have raised the song of praise. Blessed, thrice blessed, holy above all things and unspeakably splendid is the man to whom seven dollars and six bits in copper cents is no temptation! For the same shall be accounted a god, and shall have beeves, and spring lambs, and sour cabbage, and mining stocks, and much wine, a skating rink, and a canal boat, all the days that he lives in the land, and they shall be many. And men shall say to him: Let us go take a drink, for the deed that thou hast done, behold! it is an honest deed, and thou art worthy to treat. Then the wicked Town Crier shall be consumed with envy, and shall stand afar off and throw dirt, saying.

The Arbitration Treaty.

The importance of the treaty just ratified between the United States and Great Britain for the settlement of pending questions between the two powers is such as would justify its publication in extenso did our limits permit, and were such a course calculated to promote a thorough understanding of its provisions. But we think an understanding of its provisions will be made more easy to the popular mind by the following abstract than by a perusal of the text: 1. Regrets expressed by Great Britain. Alabama claims referred to five arbitrators from United States, England, Brazil, Italy and Switzerland. 2. To meet at Geneva, soon, and decide all questions by majority. 3. Papers to be delivered by each side to arbitrators—at least within six months from ratification. 4. Within four months afterwards each side may deliver reply to arbitrators, but arbitrators may extend this time. 5. Within two months afterwards each side to deliver a paper, showing evidence on which the reply is based, and support it orally in writing. 6. Arbitrations to be governed by the three new rules: 1st. A nation is bound to use diligence in preventing fitting out, arming or equipping of vessels, which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended for war against a power with which it is at peace; also in preventing departure. 2d. Not to let the belligerents use its ports as naval bases. 3d. To use diligence in ports to prevent violation of these rules. These rules acknowledged not to have been in force when the Alabama escaped, but England to be judged by them all the same. 7. Decision of arbitrators to be given if possible within three months from close of argument. Decision to refer to each award separately. Arbitrators, if they find that England has been in fault under the new rules, may award compensation. 8. Each side to pay its own agents and share expenses of arbitration. 9. Records to be kept. 10. If arbitrators decide that Great Britain has been in fault, but does not award a given sum as compensation, a Board of Assessors to be appointed, to consist of one named by England, one by the United States, and one by the Italian Minister at Washington. Board to sit at Washington, New York or Boston, and to decide claims seriatim. 11. Decisions to be final. 12. Claims not Alabama claims to be referred to three Commissioners, one named by England, one by the United States, and one conjointly, or by the Spanish Minister at Washington. Commissioners to meet at Washington. 13. And receive evidence and decide claims individually. 14. Claims to be presented within six months from meeting of Commission. Awards to be given within two years. 15. Payments to be made within twelve months of award. 16. Records to be kept. 17. Decisions to be final. 18. Americans to have liberty of sea fishing on the coast of British North America. 19. British subjects to have similar liberty on American coasts as far south as 39 deg. lat. 20. Places particularly reserved under the treaty of 1854 to be still reserved. 21. Fish to be admitted into each country free of duty. 22. Commissioners to decide whether the United States should pay compensation, and if so how much, for the superior advantages thus gained by the United States. 23. Commission to consist of three, one named by England, one by the United States, and one conjointly, or by the London representative of Austria. Commissioners to meet in Halifax. 24. They may arrange their own rules of procedure. 25. Records to be kept. 26. Navigation of the rivers St. Lawrence, Yukon, Porcupine, and Stikine to be free. 27. Government of England to urge that of Canada to grant free navigation in Welland and other canals. 28. Navigation of Lake Michigan to be free. 29. Goods destined for Canada, etc., may be transmitted through United States free of duty, and goods for United States through Canada, etc. 30 to 32. Detailed regulations in re this subject. 33. These clauses to take effect as soon as the laws providing for them shall be passed by British and Colonial Parliaments. These to remain in force for ten years, or further for two years after notice on either side. 34. San Juan boundary to be left to arbitration of the German Emperor. 35. Decisions to be final. 36. Case and evidence to be laid before the Emperor within six months of ratification. Replies to be delivered within six months of delivery of case. 37. Arbitrator may call for evidence and hear counsel. 38 to 42. Details. 43. Ratifications to be exchanged within six months, or earlier.

— We grieve to relate that the dead body of a Chinaman was found the other day out near the Mission. His nationality was determined by the presence of his queue, which had been neatly riven from his pate and ingeniously tied about the waist of a corpulent brick. The brick was deftly imbedded in the head of the deceased. The only other wound visible—or at least worthy of mention—was a slight perforation of the chest, very much as if some one had sunk a pick through. The features were distorted, and had that placid, hopeless expression as of one who had striven against the Spirit until it had abandoned him to the gentle ministrations of a more effective Irishman. The only clue to the name of the deceased is found in the supererogation of an old letter picked up under his starboard quarter: "Dunnia O'Rafferty, Wurrukman on the shirates of the city; San Francisco, California." The letter was mailed at a town of illegible name in County Cork, Ireland, where the family of the deceased probably resides. Mr. O'Rafferty's mysterious death will be a sad blow to them.

Our European Reflex.

It is worthy of remark, and indeed may be classed among one of the far-reaching multiple arms of the Nemesis of nations, that Thiers, who almost alone opposed the declaration of war by the government of Napoleon, is the one who signs the treaty of peace on behalf of the conquered nation. Nay, more, the man who urged that France was unprepared either with men or money, now brings words of hope and consolation that he can gradually pay off the enormous debt incurred by the war and redeem his country from the bondage of debt that the conqueror has imposed as its ransom. From being Commander-in-Chief, Thiers has now become Chancellor of the Exchequer, and his financial statement will go more to restore peace and confidence than thousands of mitrailleuses or forts Mont. St. Valerien. France, under the idea of a burden of impost it were impossible to bear, became rebellious and turbulent. France, seeing its way out of the depth, becomes self-reliant, hopeful and peaceable. And yet this last crime of Paris added eighty-seven millions of dollars to her debt. On the other hand, the clear statement by Thiers of the financial position of the country has effected two good objects: It has made the people fully understand the necessity of paying the indemnity, and has likewise established the fact that the country is perfectly able to do so. The one proves the futility of rebellion, the other incites to action for deliverance from bondage; for France will be in bonds until the last dollar is paid for her redemption, and the sooner the people feel that to be the case the better. The Pope is holding a levee at Rome with a simulacra of temporal power. Crowned heads, Catholic and Protestant, are sending congratulations on his having attained to the term of twenty-five years of spiritual dominion, and he fondly hopes that a reaction is taking place. Simultaneously with this a petition comes from Rome to Paris praying once more for French intervention. Another instance of near-sighted policy instigated by false hopes. France cannot again send her legions into Rome without a war, and Thiers is not a man to risk that fresh calamity. An organization, partly secret, partly overt, has been formed in, and is now spread all over Europe. It is known by the name of the International, and is neither more nor less than Communism under another name. Communism made plausible, as indeed it should be, for philosophically speaking its tenets are admirable, and it is only the natural character of mankind that renders it impracticable. It calls for a higher standard of goodness than is possessed by the multitude, and consequently must fail. It may, nay does exist in single individuals, but their voice, like the voice of reason to an infuriated mob, is drowned in the clangor of passion. This Internationalism, however, spreads, and is creating uneasiness in hard-working, thickly-populated Belgium. The two parties (liberal and conservative, or clerical and anti-clerical) are so evenly balanced in that country, and so bitterly antagonistic, that anything which strengthens the one is deeply felt by the other. The English appear to be satisfied with the result of the American Convention, and honors are being bestowed on the members who composed it. The present session of the English Parliament draws to a close. It opened with a promise of important measures to be brought before it. The war in Europe was still raging; the lesson taught by it caused grave doubts to arise whether a reform in the army system and increased grants for army estimates were not absolutely called for. Various complicated questions with Europe and America were also on the tapis, and yet comparatively little has been done. The Prime Minister has been more successful in tiding the ship of State over the shoals than in passing salutary measures of reform or of strengthening his position in the House or with the country. The terms which the Commission has concluded with America will shortly be made public, and this appears to be the only ministerial undertaking which has been pushed to a conclusion. Gladstone has lost ground, but it is a question whether Disraeli has gained any. The ballot bill may pass, and its effect will be to transfer several county seats to the Liberal or Radical party; in fact all changes will tend in that direction. If such should happen we may see the House of Commons divided into three parties, the extreme of Tory and Radical and a middle or moderate party composed of members holding opinions between the two. The present condition of Germany and the combination of the various German States or kingdoms under one head has caused attention to be called to the diplomatic service of Great Britain and the necessity for its simplification. If Victor Hugo had contented himself with his fame as a poet he would have been wise; as it is he has proved himself an ass, for none but an ass puffed up with self-conceit could have made the following grandiloquent offer: "This asylum which the Belgian Government refused to the vanquished I offer it. Where? In Belgium. I do Belgium this honor. I offer an asylum at Brussels at No. 4 Place des Barricades." Even the stolid Belgians laughed at this bathos, and turned the poet out of the kingdom.

The Copper Balloon.—Wise, the Philadelphia aeronaut, proposes making the copper balloon he advocates 200 feet in diameter, the metal weighing one pound to the square foot. The copper contains an inner ounce of cloth fixed round air tight at the bottom. The hydrogen is to be introduced between the copper and the cloth, so as gradually to expel atmospheric air and the cloth together. When that is accomplished, the cloth will be detached; and India rubber diaphragm at the bottom admits of contraction or expansion from varying atmospheric pressure. Mr. Wise estimates this balloon to have sixty-eight tons carrying power, so as to carry ammunition or explosives for the purposes of war.

Grant and His Peace-Pipe.

It is ardently to be wished that in the better world, whether all we scoundrels tend, the possession of great skill in "the scientific slaughter of mankind," and some talent for the President business, may be somewhat oftener accompanied by hard practical sense in the matter of judging of what one sees with his eyes. We have been betrayed into this somewhat prolix reflection by reading a reported—and doubtless correctly reported—monologue of President Grant a, concerning the red Indian. According to the President, "those who clamor for the destruction of the Indian either are interested, or know nothing of the condition of affairs in the wild regions where the Indians live." As they are chiefly men who reside among them, the ignorance hypothesis will hardly do, and we are bound, by the Presidential manner of "putting things," to suppose they are "interested." Their interest is, in most cases, limited to a desire to preserve their property, their lives, and the lives of their families. If this kind of interest finds its expression in "clamor," it may be said in addition that that form of protest is made respectable by the universal custom of birds and beasts who have been robbed of their nestlings and their whelps, respectively. Clamor is the language of outraged nature, and, if voted unpleasant at the White House, and vigorously excluded, it may, with all the more charity, be tolerated on the plains. But, says the President, "When I said, 'Let us have peace,' I meant it. I want peace on the plains and everywhere else." Thanks; you and your Quakers have been some time in power, and still the prairie daisies are nourished at the root with settlers' blood; still the horizon is hazy with the smoke of cabins, and still the ravished mother essays to lift her broken arms about her murdered babe. Peace! O, yes, let us have it, and let its emblem be a dead olive branch, fit to kindle a cheerful blaze upon the writhing body of the pioneer, staked and fettered to the plain. "The Apaches are war-like; that is, the young savages wander off to rob and murder occasionally, but no doubt they have provocation." No doubt. There is the provocation of their own lust, cupidity, and wanton general brutality. Then there is that greatest of all possible provocations—opportunity; the opportunity furnished by the presence of United States protectors in blue uniform. "The Quakers, and other denominations of Christians, are laboring with effect among the Indians. I will give them all the support I can. I don't like riding over and shooting these poor savages." No more do we; it's dangerous. It used to be dangerous—to all but the commander-in-chief—to ride over and shoot the poor Confederates in the days that you and we wot of. Where, then, O, Christian Hero, were thy Quakers? 'Egad! we were all Quakers, but we had no time for the milk-and-morality cant of the advanced humanitarian. We had no votes to catch in those perilous times, and that kind of talk would not have caught them, anyhow. We had but "bloody noses and cracked crowns, and passed them current, too." We are deathly unwell of this babble of a high Christian civilization—this painting a thistle with ruddy pigments, and dubbing it a rose. Every intelligent and observing man who has—as Grant says he has, and as we have—"lived with the Indians, and known them thoroughly," knows that not one ray of justice, honor, or humanity ever illumed the moonless midnight of their savage lives; that not a touch of pity ever impressed their stony hearts. He knows that when they stay their bloody hands to keep a truce, it is because they dare not kill. He knows that by the same meter they measure us, construing forbearance as weakness, and good faith as fear. He knows, in short, that the Indian is but a tearing animal, who has attained to the physical, but not the moral, dignity of going upon two legs.

— Some sensitive brass-bandist is exceeding wroth because the Bulletin alluded to his kind as "horn-blowers," and suggested the justice of their giving their tuneful services gratis on Independence day. They are horn-blowers. Moreover, they ought to give their tuneful services gratis. Furthermore, they are upon all public occasions addicted to the knavery of dividing one band into two, and ringing in "dummies" with corked horns, who boast the laboring lung, protrude the strained eyeball, crack the swelling cheek, and redden royally about the gills, without making any noise. If they won't toot for nothing, they should be furnished with a tutor who will make them toot. If the Grand Marshal will appoint us chairman of the finance committee we will see that patriotism is not taxed anything for blowing unless the orator of the day puts in a claim for compensation. We don't march in any absurd procession, but we can be made useful in repudiating bills.

— Compound fractures of the leg from being run over by trucks are now so common that no surgeon ever goes out without his case of instruments. About eleven o'clock in the forenoon the scene along Kearny and Montgomery streets is very novel and inspiring. Upon nearly every corner may be seen a surgeon, holding a maimed patient upon a sawbuck with his knee, and calmly rasping off a leg. Making the ordinary allowance for lying, this is strictly true, and may be implicitly believed in. The skill of the surgeon may not.

— Texas has a new game in cards—one holds a revolver, the other holds the cards. A coroner holds the inquest.

The First Blackbird.

This morn I heard a merry lay
Up in the chestnut tree;
It was a strain of love and May
The blackbird sang to me.
It seem'd to echo through my heart,
Where had been silence long;
I could not help but take a part
In that most grateful song.

He pour'd his wordless psalm of praise
In loud and cheerful tone,
Unmindful of the dreary days
He had so lately known.
The Winter's hunger, frost and cold
The winds and tempests rude,
Were all forgot, or left untold
In joy and gratitude.

I took the lesson to myself;
One is so apt to mourn,
To grieve and sigh for things gone by,
For troubles long since borne,
So should we rather gladly sing,
And hopeful journey on,
Just as the blackbird welcomed Spring,
Ere Winter days were gone.

Rifle in Hand.

A few weeks ago the telegraph brought the sad tidings of the death of Lieut. Cushing, 3d U. S. Cavalry, at the hands of the Apaches, in Arizona. He was as valiant a young soldier as ever fought those murderous savages, and his death may be fitly characterized as nothing less than a public calamity. The Apaches seem to have known and respected his courage and gallantry, for they left his body unmutilated on the field of battle. The same telegram announced the death of Wm. H. Simpson. He had been an old frontiersman, known from the northern waters of the Missouri and Mississippi to the valleys and mountains of Sonora. He was a native of England, but naturalized as a citizen of the United States in the State of Ohio. For the last ten years he has been a resident of Sonora, having but recently come to Tucson, A. T., to reside. At the time of his death he was forty-three years of age. He accompanied Lieut. Cushing as a guide on his expedition against that noted and most formidable Apache chief, Cachise, and with Cushing met his death. A private letter says: "He died, rifle in hand, alongside of Lieut. Cushing. When struck by the first bullet he fell from his horse and lay stunned for a moment. Cushing ordered two men to carry him away, when he sprang to his feet, exclaiming: 'One is enough to send to me; bring my gun, quickly.' A part of the lower jaw was carried away by the bullet, and, while the blood streamed from this terrible wound, he stood firm; and, after the fourth Indian had fallen by his unerring fire, he fell himself, by a second bullet piercing his breast." Surely the days of heroic deeds have not gone by forever.

Naval.

A Board of Officers, composed of Captain Paul Shirley as presiding officer, and Commander R. L. Pythian and Lieutenant Leonard Chenery as members, was recently convened to examine officers for promotion. Lieutenants Robert M. Berry and Clifford B. Gill, and Ensigns Fernando P. Gilmore and Uriel Sobree were recommended for advancement, all of them having passed highly creditable examinations as to their moral, mental and professional qualifications, their physical condition having previously been pronounced upon by a Board of Naval Surgeons. These officers have seen some hard service in Alaska and in Central America, and are now well bronzed, hardy-looking sons of Neptune.

Gypsum on Grape Vines.—A grape raiser in the interior writes of this fertilizer thus: "My experience is this: on grass it is the best and cheapest manure I can use. On grape vines no person would believe, unless they saw, the great improvement by a slight dressing. The leaves are larger and a darker green, and the fruit one-third larger. On my hops, mixed with guano, the result was highly satisfactory. On potatoes it will keep off or kill the grubs or worms, and is a good manure when applied in the hill or drill."

— President Grant says the Indians are capable of Christian civilization. No one has ever doubted it. Since the settlement of the country by the predatory Christian, they have abandoned all the merely savage virtues, and they now get drunk, lie, cheat and steal, with gratifying proficiency.

— One Collender, a local policeman, having characteristically misbehaved himself, Judge Sawyer said he should be presented to the Commissioners for not having shown the true spirit of an officer. Seems to us that's just what he did show.

Grapes of Thorns.

We must not hope to be mowers,
And to gather the ripe gold ears,
Until we have first been sowers,
And water'd the furrows with tears.

It is not just as we take it—
This mystical world of ours:
Life's field will yield, as we make it,
A harvest of thorns or flowers!
—Alice Cary.

Matrimonial Superstitions.

In olden days, June was held the most propitious month in the twelve for marriage, a happy result being rendered doubly certain if the ceremony was timed so as to take place at the full moon, or when the sun and moon were in conjunction. That unimpeachable authority, the registrar-general, tells us that May is in these latter days a favorite marrying month in England, so that one matrimonial superstition has gone the way all such fancies are doomed, sooner or later, to go; for May used to be as much avoided by persons about to marry as June was favored, that merry month being supposed to be specially under the influence of malignant spirits delighting in domestic discord. "The girls are all stark naught that wed in May," is the verdict of one old saw; another declares—

"From the marriages in May
All the bairns die and decay;"

A third pronounces, "Who marries between the sickle and the scythe will never thrive;" while a poet, complimenting the month at the expense of what should be the ruling passion in marriage-minded folk, sings—

"May never was the month of Love,
For May is full of flowers;
But rather April, wet by kind,
For Love is full of showers."

But if old sayings ruled the world, there would be no marrying at all, for a very old one avers that no man enters the holy state without repenting his rashness before the year is out; unless, indeed, everybody determined, like the old Norfolk farmer, to cheat the adage by wedding on the 31st of December. In times gone by, candidates for connubiality were obliged to study times and seasons. The Church would not allow them to marry just when they felt inclined. "Marriage," says the register of Norton, "comes in on the 13th of January, and at Septuagesima Sunday it is out again until Low Sunday, at which time it comes in again, and goes not out till Rogation Sunday; thence it is forbidden until Trinity Sunday; from thence it is unforbidden till Advent Sunday, and comes not in again until the 13th of January." That those concerned might better remember the rules, somebody put them into rhyme, running thus:

"Advent marriage doth deny,
But Hilary gives thee liberty;
Septuagesima says thee nay;

Eight days from Easter says you may;
Rogation bids thee to contain,
But Trinity sets thee free again."

It was considered improper to marry upon Innocent's Day, because it commemorated the slaughter of the children by Herod; and it was equally wrong to wed upon St. Joseph's Day. In fact, the whole season of Lent was declared sacred from the intrusion of Hymen's devotees. "Marry in Lent, and you'll repent;" and there are good people among us still who, if they do not believe that bit of proverbial wisdom to be prophetic, undoubtedly think Lenten wedders deserve to find it so. We may possibly be doing a service to some of our readers by informing them (on the authority of a manuscript of the fifteenth century, quoted in the "Book of Days") that there are just thirty-two days in the year upon which it is inadvisable to go into join-hand—namely, seven in January, three each in February, March, May and December; two each in April, June, July, August, September, and November, and one in October; so that January is the worst and October the best month for committing matrimony; the actual unlucky days being these: January 1st, 2d, 4th, 5th, 7th, 10th, 15th; February 6th, 7th, 18th; March 1st, 6th, 8th; April 6th, 11th; May 5th, 6th, 7th; June 7th, 15th; July 5th, 19th; August 15th, 19th; September 4th, 7th; October 6th; November 15th, 16th; December 15th, 16th, 17th. As to which is the best day of the week, why—

"Monday for wealth;
Tuesday for health;
Wednesday the best day of all;

Thursday for crosses;
Friday for losses;
Saturday no luck at all."

Friday is generally considered an unlucky day in England; but in France the country lasses look upon the first Friday in the month as peculiarly favorable, if not for the actual ceremony, at least for determining who will be the principal actors in it. Before getting into bed the curious damsel raises one leg, and plants it against the foot of the bed, hoping by this simple action to induce the patron of bachelors, good St. Nicholas, to show her in her sleep the counterfeit presentment of her destined husband.—Chambers' Journal.

— A German comic weekly has appeared, and we cordially commend it. We commend it the more cordially from a natural tenderness, such as one feels for a dolphin, who is bright only when he is out of his element, and about to die.

The "California Mail Bag"—What the Press Say of It.

A new enterprise in the shape of a monthly magazine has been started by the indefatigable proprietor of the San Francisco News Letter. It has a unique and very handsome exterior, and contains an amount and variety of the best reading matter, especially interesting to Californians, which is certainly not equaled by any periodical, either monthly or quarterly, we have ever come across. The first number was issued on Saturday, at the moderate price of twenty-five cents. The proprietor is determined, evidently, to give the public the full worth of their shilling. The Mail Bag embraces, according to the cover, "Illustrations of the Wealth, Activity, Progress, and Development of the Material Interests of the Pacific Coast, together with a complete Résumé of all Items of Interest gathered from the Weekly Issues of the San Francisco News Letter." A careful examination of the contents convinces us that this programme is liberally carried out. There is an admirable map of the Central Pacific Railroad and its connections, "with very picturesque views of all the grand natural scenes through which it passes. The Month" contains the concise journal of each day's events of public and local interest. Articles on the "Mineral Resources of California," "How to Reach California and Oregon," "Our Home Exports, Cereals, Etc.," "Vine-Culture and Wine-Making in California," "Wool," "Opium Culture—A New Branch of Industry," "The Quartz Mines of Placer County," are all exceedingly valuable for their reliable statistical information, and the clear view taken by the experienced writers on these important subjects, which require for their exhaustive handling special in distinction to general knowledge. Besides the large and beautiful map of the Pacific Railroad, there are maps of California and of "Transcontinental Railroads, as Working and Proposed, with their Connections." The literary matter consists of articles illustrative of all subjects—men, manners, countries, and events. As a companion to the traveler we can conceive of nothing more congenial than the Mail Bag, which never worries the mind by long prosings, but sparkles with every species of literary gem. The best of those pithy, mirth-provoking, and satirical articles which have given the News Letter a distinctive character, and a "name to live" in every civilized portion of the world, are reproduced in this monthly Mail Bag. Here we have, interspersed with graver themes, those unmistakable and clear-cut vagaries—how else can we characterize the rhapsodical satirist?—of the inexhaustible Town Crier. His facetious yet iconoclastic eye slyly peers at us from all parts of the volume—for a volume this monthly is. We can regale at our leisure on the very creme de la creme of his prolific wit. He has, however, anything but a "milky way" of writing, being a concentrated essence of tartaric acid, sulphur, brimstone, "sling" and "smash." We trust he will not put his sling into active use on reading this, or the smash will certainly be ours. Racy paragraphs, literary notes, admirable poems, in the selection of which (where they are not original) Mr. Marriott has a good taste and discrimination such as few editors can boast of, complete a "feast of fat things" within the covers of the Mail Bag such as the public has never been offered before.—Oakland News, June 12th.

We have received a visit from Mr. George Johns, the urbane traveling agent of the San Francisco News Letter, and just now engaged in furthering the business interests of Marriott's new venture, the California Mail Bag. This publication is externally the handsomest ever produced on this coast. It is in magazine form, with a characteristic colored wrapper, and numbers over one hundred pages of reading matter, selected from the best materials of the News Letter, and enriched by many original articles and tables on commercial subjects. It is a résumé and collation of the wittiest periodical in the world, and as such we should insult the intelligence of mankind generally did we not predict for it an extended circulation and a deep-rooted popularity. The Mail Bag will be issued monthly, and will do, not only to read, but to keep.—Sacramento Record, June 14th.

The first number of the California Mail Bag has made its appearance, and it is prepossessing. The cover is illuminated, being unlike that of any other magazine in this country, but resembling some of the London monthlies of Society. Its closely printed pages furnish a great variety of matter, and the intention of the publisher seems to have been to make the Mail Bag unique in its way, like other California productions. It is made up, in part, from the pages of the News Letter, but has, nevertheless, an individuality of its own, which will cause it to be sought after at home and abroad.—Call, June 14th.

The first number of a new monthly, the California Mail Bag, has reached us. It is very neatly printed, is full of the best things from the News Letter, contains an excellent portrait and biographical notice of Leland Stanford, a summary of the month's news, a special article on mineral resources, vine culture and wine making, wool, etc., and is crammed with advertisements. It is embellished with numerous railroad maps, etc., and is sold for the low price of twenty-five cents.—Alta,

Mr. George Johns, traveling agent of the San Francisco News Letter, and business manager for the Mail Bag, the excellent collection issued monthly from the News Letter office, and which we noticed yesterday, arrived in town last evening from the Bay. He informs us that although the first number of the Mail Bag was issued on Saturday last, one thousand copies were disposed of on that day. The new periodical is already a great popular favorite.—Sacramento Reporter, June 14th.

We have received the June number of a publication under the title of the California Mail Bag, from Frederick Marriott of the News Letter, which is filled with matter that has appeared in its columns at different times, and is accompanied with maps and views of the Central Pacific Railroad and a section of California.—Sacramento Union, Monday, June 12th.

Court Chat.

— Lord Strathnairn, presiding at the annual meeting of the Royal Cambridge Asylum for Soldiers' Widows, expressed an earnest hope that nothing would be done in the way of army reform to change the feeling of affection and regard between the British soldier and his officer which was seen in the admirable discipline that had enabled our army to carry its colors all over the world. He related the story which he recently told in the House of Lords, of an officer of the Rifle Brigade who was being carried away by a rush of the stream in the Ganges, when a private of the same regiment jumped in to his rescue. The officer, thinking that both must die, exclaimed: "My fine fellow, you cannot save me; try and save yourself;" whereupon the soldier expressed his determination to remain with him, and on being remonstrated with, said: "How could I go back and face my company if I left you to die alone?" Having had himself the command of two battalions of that distinguished regiment in India, he could vouch for it that that simple anecdote represented the feeling of every soldier in them, and, he ventured to add, in the whole four battalions.

— The London Gazette contains the following announcement of the elevation of Miss Burdett-Coutts to the peerage: "The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal granting the dignity of a baroness of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto Angela Georgina Burdett-Coutts, of Stratton street, in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, and of Holly Lodge, Highgate, both in the county of Middlesex, spinster, youngest daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, of Foremark, in the county of Derby, and of Ransbury, in the county of Wilts, Bart., deceased, and Sophia, his wife, youngest daughter of Thos. Coutts, Esq., also deceased, by the name, style, and title of Baroness Burdett-Coutts, of Highgate and Brookfield, in the county of Middlesex; and at her decease the dignity of a Baron of the said United Kingdom to the heirs male of her body lawfully begotten by the name, style and title of Baron Burdett-Coutts, of Highgate and Brookfield, in the said county of Middlesex."

— When the Galatea, of which ship the Duke of Edinburgh is captain, was paid off, a few weeks since, at the Davenport dock yard, her royal commander was present at the pay-table. After all the men had received the amount due to them, a procession was formed, headed by the elephant which was given to his Royal Highness in India, and accompanied by the band of the ship. The crew walked through the principal streets of the town to the Mechanics' Institute, where, at the expense of the Prince, the whole of the men, about 450 in number, were provided with dinner. The streets through which the procession passed were lined with people, who accorded the Duke and his fine crew a very hearty farewell greeting.

— Mr. J. Camden Hotten promises "The Original Lists of Persons of Quality, Emigrants, Religious Exiles, Political Rebels, Serving-Men sold for a Term of Years, Apprentices, Children stolen, Maidens pressed, and others who went from Great Britain to the American Plantations between 1600 and 1700," with their ages, the localities where they formerly lived in the mother country, the names of the ships in which they embarked, and other interesting particulars. He has compiled these lists from MSS. preserved in the State Paper Department of Her Majesty's Public Record Office, England.

— A Roman correspondent says that his Holiness the Pope is about to proceed to the Castel Gandolfo, as he does not wish to be in Rome at the Festa dello Statuto, the Italian National fête. The illustrious "prisoner of the Vatican," however, by way of expressing his contempt for the Italian Government, and to avoid the honors—or insults, as he terms them—which would otherwise be paid him by the Italian soldiery, contemplates leaving in the night, at a season and an hour known only to himself and some few of his most immediate attendants.

— On Friday night, June 2d, the Countess of Stair gave a grand evening party in Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh, which was attended by upwards of 1,100 ladies and gentlemen. The decorations in the palace were much the same as in former years, but they were even more tastefully done. The company began to arrive at nine o'clock, and were received by the Lord High Commissioner and the Countess of Stair. The band of the Scots Greys was stationed on the quadrangle, and played a selection of airs.

— A mutual marriage-present and match-making society, with the appropriate title of the Maidens' Club, we learn from a Birmingham paper, is doing good work in the village of Stickney, in Lincolnshire. The members are of both sexes, and when one gets married the Club presents him or her with a marriage-present. That the members of the Club may shine in grace, excelled by none in the village, one of its objects is to induce young people to become and continue members of the Church of England.

— On the night of June 2d, the elephant presented to the Duke of Edinburgh in India, and brought home by his Royal Highness in the Galatea, was being conveyed to London by the mail train from Plymouth, when it attempted to get out of the horse-box in which it was placed. Its keeper, a corporal of the Royal Marines, endeavoring to prevent its doing so, was knelt upon by the animal and crushed to death.

— The late Marquis of Hertford left estates in Ireland, worth about £70,000 a year, to Mr. Richard Wallace, by a codicil, the estates having been, in the first instance, bequeathed to Sir Hamilton Seymour. The validity of this codicil is questioned, and the trial will come on at the next Down Assizes.

— The Duke of Edinburgh has no idea of idling, and expresses the hope that the Admiralty will give him command of another ship shortly. "If," says the Court Journal, "his Royal Highness has not influence sufficient, we hope Mr. Goschen will consider our recommendation and the Prince's past good services as of some weight."

— We understand, says the Court Journal of May 27th, that his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia, second son of the Emperor of Russia, attended by a numerous suite, is expected to arrive in a few days from Germany. His Imperial Highness will stay several weeks in England.

— The Prince Consort National Memorial to be erected in the capital of Scotland is in an advanced state of preparation, but up to the present time great uncertainty prevails as to the site it will positively occupy. Any change of site from the Queen's-park must be sanctioned by her Majesty.

— A former Lord Mayor of London, Sir Thomas Harper, left two fields in Bloomsbury for the education of poor boys in Bedfordshire. At the time of the bequest the value of the land was £40 a year. Now it is £80,000, and at the end of the present lease it will be about £160,000.

— In consequence of the death of Sir John Herschel, Sir J. Shaw Lefevre, the clerk of the Parliaments, becomes the oldest senior wrangler of Cambridge, having attained that distinction in 1818, Sir J. Herschel having been senior wrangler in 1813.

— After June the International Exhibition will have some increased attractions. A lot of foreign pictures of world-wide fame is coming over in July. The contemplated additions are spoken of with enthusiasm by art critics.

— The first sod of the Whitby, Lofthouse and Middlesborough Railway was turned on Thursday, May 25th, by the Dowager Marchioness of Normanby at Sandsend. The déjeuner afterwards was presided over by Lord William Montague Hay.

— The Pope, who completed his 80th year on the 13th May, states that his official age takes two years off, from a mistake made in copying his baptismal register when he was consecrated bishop.

— The south-east wing of the royal palace of Holyroodhouse is in progress of being handsomely furnished, in case her Majesty should choose to spend a day or two there in the autumn.

Brevities.

— No plant yields anything like as much nutriment from the same extent of soil as the banana. Baron Humboldt estimated that it returns 20 times as much as the potato, and 113 times as much as wheat.

— A young man has been sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment for kissing a young woman outside the Worcestershire Hall. He had made a bet that he would kiss fifty girls going down the street.

— A Western editor, who doesn't know much about farming any way, suggests that for garden-making, a cast iron back with a hinge in it would be an improvement on the spinal column now in use.

— A Louisville girl's lover went and committed crimes. She told him she couldn't wed him, but would lend him $2,500, which he took and started out to redeem his moral character.

— The French young ladies in society now refuse to dance the "German." They feel indignant at the poor figure which their lovers made in the German a few months ago.

— Champagne punch, dispensed by lovely girls in ringlets and delicate dresses, takes the place of the inspiring strawberry and the placid oyster, at New Orleans church fairs.

— Miss White has been made cashier of a bank at Weymouth, Mass. Under ordinary circumstances women handle men's money as much as is actually necessary, without making bankers of them.

— An exchange mentions a case beyond the ordinary oculists. It is that of a young lady who, instead of a common pupil, has a college student in her eye.

— One of the wealthiest bankers of Chicago is charged with stealing the gas belonging to another man, by tapping his pipe on the wrong side of the meter.

— Mr. Doyle, of Brooklyn, while sick was attended by his faithful wife. She attended him with a poker. He has now gone to the hospital and she to jail.

— Dr. Bush says the reason why Germans die so seldom with consumption is the fact of their singing from their earliest childhood.

— It has rained so hard at Milwaukee for four months that the Chicago Republican asserts all the children born there are web-footed.

— King Amadeus is learning to talk Spanish. The Carlists and Republicans are anxious to give him lessons in walking Spanish.

— A young man in Delaware has made his debut on the stage in order to defray his expenses while studying for the ministry.

The Epitaph of "The Buried Animosities."

The last number of George Alfred Townsend's new paper, The Capital, published at Washington, contains a fanciful and humorous sketch purporting to be a report of some remarks in the United States Senate on the ratification of the Treaty, in which the following is attributed to Senator Vickers. He thought our late commissioners were sextons, and this work of theirs, called the treaty, was a deep grave in which the common differences of the Anglo-Saxon race were buried. In accordance with this idea his speech was a monument, on that monument he would inscribe the following epitaph:

Here lie, consigned to Peptual Olivion, the Buried Animosities of two Great Nations, and a Host of Colonies and Provinces.

They were Born

In the Heat of a Fratricidal War; They were Nourished by

Envy, Hate, and Jealousy;

They grew to manhood through Falsehood, Malice, and Selfishness.

While they lived

They swayed a Potent Influence;

Through them, Nations Flattered in the Path of Duty,

And the bands on the Dial of Progress

Stood Still.

While they lived, Sixty Millions of People, Speaking the Same Tongue,

Forgot their common origin and destiny, and were only

Anxious to Imbrue their Hands in Each Other's Blood!

Now

That they have

Passed Away, the Ominous Clouds of War have Burst, and through the rents gleam

Auspicious Omens from the Silvery Star of Peace!

Theatrical.

Mr. Adams has continued to produce new pieces, among which must be particularized The Inconstant; or, Wine Works Wonders, a comedy of the old school, full of quips, intrigue and stratagem, in which Mr. Adams, as "Young Mirabel;" Mr. McCullough as "Captain Duretete;" Miss Howard as "Oriana," and Miss Gordon as "Bizarre," acted in the true spirit of comedy. To-night that worthily-esteemed actress and whole-hearted woman, Mrs. Judah, will receive the annual congratulations of her friends and admirers, the name whereof is Legion, and present a bill worthy of the occasion. The Homage, with Mr. Adams as "Duke Aranza," he having kindly volunteered as a mark of respect and friendship to his old friend, to be followed by the commedietta of Little Toddlekins, in which Mrs. Judah is superexcellent, and Mr. Raymond execratable. On Monday night the business manager, Mr. Frank Cilley, will have a complimentary benefit, at which Miss Helen C. Dineon will assist as "Victoria," in the operetta of The Invincibles, together with the drama of Hunted Down, in which all the principal members of the company will appear; and during the week Miss Gordon, who is universally popular as a charming actress and a refined lady, will bid adieu to her many and refined patrons in San Francisco, when she will appear as "Jeanie Deans," in The Heart of Mid Lothian, assisted by Mr. Raymond, Mr. McCullough, W. Edwards, Mrs. Judah, Miss May Howard and Miss Minnie Walton. Miss Gordon will be regretted by a large circle of private friends and public admirers, to whom she has endeared herself as an artist and a woman.

Naval Signal Light--A New Discovery.

At length that curious compound, phosphure of calcium, has been utilized. Inserted in a metal cylinder with a small orifice at the top and punctured at the bottom for the admission of water, the orifice closed by metal foil, the signal light is ready for instantaneous use. Simply tearing off the foil the cartridge, which is surrounded with a wooden float, is thrown into the water or placed in a pail of that liquid. The phosphorized hydrogen evolved by contact with the water passes up through the top hole or burner, and coming in contact with atmospheric air is spontaneously ignited, giving a most brilliant light. It is impossible to extinguish it, except momentarily, as it instantly relights for the same reason that it ignites in the first instance. They are constructed to burn for forty minutes, are economical in construction, and bid fair to supercede blue lights for naval purposes.

— It is not every man who can make an intelligent defense. The case of the sheep-killer, who pleaded that he would not permit himself to be bitten by a neighbor's ewes while passing peaceably along the highway, is in point. A friend whom we accidentally heard swearing at his wife has just attempted to justify himself by explaining that she sewed a whole row of button-holes on the wrong side of his dressing-gown. These things make one lose his faith in human nature.

A rumor is in circulation that Fred Grant is hankering after Princess Beatrice.—Exchange. We have been reliably informed that Emperor Norton is about to wear the dinky but accomplished Queen of the Cannibal Islands.—The Haight epidemic is spreading far and wide. The subsidy business has about the same effect on the public as a crimson rag on an irascible turkey rooster.—Respectable Irishman shot at Haywards by peace-loving German. Cause, a squabble about the price of chickens.—The political contest engages all unabsorbed interest. So far as the nominations are concerned, it now seems sufficiently clear that Haight and Booth are to be the standard bearers of their respective parties. This suits the Examiner and also the Sacramento Union. And still it is possible that these results are not to be bet on. The Conventions have not yet assembled—and Conventions are very uncertain.—The death of Gregory Yale is lamented by a host of friends. California has never boasted a more accomplished lawyer than Yale. His erudition was prodigious, and the native qualities of his intellect were of the most brilliant order.—A meeting of the Catholic laymen interested in the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Pontificate of his Holiness, Pope Pius IX., met on Sunday in the basement of St. Mary's Cathedral, for the purpose of furthering arrangements for the celebration. Meantime, the Holy Father's appeal to the Powers seems to be a dead failure. We fear the "temporal power" is past praying for.—One of the Hunter's Point and Dry Dock stages was upset on Sunday afternoon. No one seriously hurt, but thirteen "insides" vigorously shaken up.—Edward Tompkins, of Oakland, has been invited by the Committee of Arrangements for the celebration of the Fourth of July to deliver the oration on that occasion. Tompkins is a good talker—that is, at least, a very voluble talker. He hath a choice array of goodly words garnered up in his memory. When it comes to ideas—but pshaw! what have ideas to do with a Fourth of July oration?—T. W. Curtis, of the Omaha Herald, and James McClatchy, of the Sacramento Bee, are at the Grand Hotel. Now, what the d—l is McClatchy down here after? He must be after something. He always is. He didn't get a nomination on the Republican ticket at Sacramento; does he mean to shake off the dust, and run for office here?—Kitty O'Hare, aged 17, jumped into the bay from Meigs's Wharf on Saturday. She was rescued and taken care of. It turned out that the precious young woman had been drinking.—The hearing of an application for an injunction restraining further proceedings on the part of the New Montgomery street Commissioners has been postponed until the 27th inst., to be heard at that time in the Fourth District Court, Judge Morrison presiding.—The Alta still clings to Selby, and still publishes the most awful bosh in the shape of "stories," written by "literary persons," who ought to be shoveling sand or manuring turnips.—McGarrahan's stock is looking up again. It is reliably stated that on the 16th the President gave instructions to the Secretary of the Interior to restore McGarrahan's record to the condition it was in before it was mutilated. This step is in accordance with the recommendation of Bingham's minority report of last winter, which was adopted by the House, but laid on the table by a decided vote in the Senate. This looks bad for our friend Neely Thompson.—The Pope declares his intention to go to Corsica, if Victor Emanuel enters Rome.—Ex-President Johnson is to be the Democratic candidate for Congress in the First District of Tennessee, and they are about to reconstruct the districts for the purpose of securing his election. Andrew used to boast that he rose from a tailor to a President. He is now on the reverse process of sinking from President to tailor again.—The Sacramento Record says: "The Amsterdam Library, the most extensive in the world, has been purchased by the New York Jewish Fifth Avenue Congregation for a Jewish seminary." We congratulate the happy purchasers. It only remains for them to buy the British Museum.—Sonoma and Marin counties send butter to Arizona.—A ballet has been produced in Rome founded on the Prodigal Son.—The use of gold and colors in architecture is fast coming into favor in New York.—H. B. M. S. Zealous has arrived, thirty-seven days from Honolulu and reports in the English papers that the old ship had gone to the bottom. John Bull, heavy fellow, must have his regular sensation. Zealous sails for Vancouver next week.—Miners intend cutting a figure on the Fourth. Insane militia man suggests sham battle by way of celebration. The booby did not take into consideration the probable accidents from misdirected waddings. Militia are so awkward, you know.—The Duke de Chartres is a candidate for the Assembly in the Department of Vendee.—The Prussians have evacuated Rouen, and 8,000 have left St. Denis and Genesee.—The San Francisco school teachers are doing the State in stray threes and couples, and the railroad people let them travel at half fares. Obliging monopolies.—Haight made a species of triumphal entry into Sacramento. "What conquests brings he home? What tributaries follow him to Rome?"—A Call correspondent has an idea that Lewis will beat Holden for Lieutenant-Governor.—It is reliably stated that Jules Ferry is appointed Minister to Washington, in place of De Treilhaut, who returns to France.—The French loan will be issued on the 26th instant, if the Assembly pass a bill authorizing it before that date.—Ye devout Catholics assemble to hold a big hoo-doo on the twenty-fifth anniversary of Pio Nino Pontificate. A grand religious celebration is anticipated.—The King and Queen of the Belgians have congratulated the Pope on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his Pontificate.—The result of the first levy for the Italian army in the Roman provinces is satisfactory. King Victor Emanuel is going to Naples, and on his return will visit Rome.—Big surgeon captured in the bay. Enterprising anatomists discover half digested net in the old dear's stomach.—The damage by flood to the Oregon farmers is severe.—Fenian raid in Mallow, Cork. Patriotic cells invade the militia armory, and get away with a number of rifles.—Grote, the historian, is dead.—The London Observer announces that Professor Montague Bernard, late of the Joint High Commission, will enter the Privy Council.—The reports that Disraeli is to be deposed from the leadership of the Opposition are untrue.—The California Pacific Railroad Company are constructing a branch road from Adelanto to Sonoma. The accommodations on all the lines of this company and the courtesy and civility of officials are respected and appreciated by the traveling public.—The Marysville Appeal says that Jesse O. Goodwin is the first choice of the people of the northern section of the Third District for Congressman.—The politicians and newspapers of Montana have commenced agitating the question of who shall be the next Delegate to Congress from that Territory.—Walla Walla sees better times ahead. By one stage coach there arrived at that town, a few days since, a sword swallower, a stone eater, and a burned pig.—The country newspapers have been criticizing Gough severely. The rural mind is outraged by the stale anecdotes, and moldy jokes of that aggressive temperance quack.—The Fourth Brigade of the National Guard of California has been ordered to parade on the Fourth of July.—The Board of Supervisors have adopted a resolution repealing the order for the opening of Montgomery street. Here's a nice kettle of fish. Here's salaries and clerk hire and Commissioner whisky gone for nothing. This city government is a strange and wonderful thing.—Woman divorced one week and married in the next by Judge Dwinelle. A progressive age.—Man in Santa Clara breaks his leg and dies of lockjaw.—Sunday fist-fighting still continues amongst our sporting "hoodlums." How nice if they took to sterner weapons and gracefully thinned themselves off.—There is a girl in Oakland who is said to have received fifteen offers of marriage from fifteen different suitors, each of whom rejoiced in a bald head and a fortune. She has refused them all, on the ground of extreme servility, and now awaits hopefully the coming out of the present generation. Money is no object. A smooth face and a decent lockie will fetch her.—Grasshoppers are, six miles south of Los Angeles, devouring the leaves and bark of the young lemon and orange trees. Everything concerning any nutriment is swept away by the army now spreading over the plains.—Professor Swinton delivered an entertaining lecture on "Army Correspondents."—It Dr. W. A. Barstow attempted suicide by firing a pistol into his right temple. He is in a precarious position. His father-in-law was about the same time thrown from a buggy and fractured his skull. Dr. Barstow is unusually respected, and much regret is expressed.—Miners thought they had bamboozled Haught. Finding their mistake on arrival of troops, and too late to organize resistance, they insult the militia. Puerile, very; we await developments. Sympathy is not with the miners, who have shown neither conduct nor discretion.—Three hundred and two more Chinese passengers have arrived per ship Ontario, thirty-four days from Hongkong. The cargo is entirely consigned to Chinese firms in this city.—The Second Adventists are holding meetings on Market street, and discussing mundane affairs. An Elder lectured Sunday night on the inventions of the age.—Steamer Louise and opposition steamer Chin du Wae collided in the bay.—Carmany, of Overland Monthly, will be a candidate for State Printer.—Only four deaths in a week in Sacramento. Vice in Concealment! Vice Phenome!—Chinman has engaged Mlle. Zimmermann, the Dresden prima donna, to visit the States; salary, 5,000 thalers per month.—The woman's journal acknowledges that Mrs. Fair has erred. That is handling the case with gloves, certainly. Grandmamma Alta has resuscitated the story of the hauns on which advances were made by a well-known banker here. Very stale.—A silver mine on a desolate rock, now named Silver Rock, in Lake Superior, proves unusually rich—said to be on an average of $1,500 to $2,000 per ton.—Borax, strewed lightly around, banishes cockroaches. So says the Alta. Old women generally understand these things.—Among the articles preserved in the Police Office is a ferretype of one of the eyes of Mary Smith, who was murdered in 1845. The likeness of a man with heavy beard is visible plainly on the enlarged picture; although it has been of no use to the police, the fact of its existence is more less singular.—An attempt was made to rob a party returning home, Sunday night, on the San Bruno road, opposite the Bay View Toll Gate. The robbers driving on, were distanced.—More trouble about Magdalena Bay. Disgusted individuals shipped from New York to that earthly paradise, have made their escape and arrived here to quarter themselves on the Benevolent Societies' protection.—Locusts are playing the mislead generally down South, near Visalia; so numerous are they that the horses positively refuse to touch the water from the wells, which they have nearly choked up.—Three members of a Buckeye family in Gold Hill, consisting of two gentlemen and a lady, weigh 684 pounds, or 228 pounds each on an average.—7,028 seal skins were received by the Sea Nymph, valued at $80,000. The whole were taken in three months.—Col. Strong's cotton, in Merced county, looks excellent; judges believe it a marked success.—Another tragedy occurred Sunday night. Mr. Eberling, 79 Clementina street, had a party at the christening of his child. Amongst the guests was Mrs. Farnen; her husband arriving, ordered her home. He was under the influence of liquor and was requested to leave. Mr. Wenner, another guest, pushed him out of the room. In a short time he returned, and placing a pistol to Wenner's breast, shot him. His death is not yet reported, but there are no hopes of his life being saved.—Lawrence Sherlock, who shot Thomas Melody, in May, for a alleged improper intimacy with his wife, has been discharged.—The claim of Troupe &

Lewis, forty miles south of Wadsworth, Nevada, is so rich in borax as to be considered more valuable than a gold mine. Each acre is estimated at eighteen tons pure borax, or $7,200. The claim covers 1,280 acres.—A man on Fifth street yesterday attempted to capsize a China peddler's basket. Peddler put down his basket, knocked down the Caucasian, and proceeded on his way. John's getting civilized.—Yellow fever is dreaded this year in New Orleans from the stagnant water left by the late inundation.—$32,400 has arrived from Oregon by the Oriflamme.—Jobbers' trade has been good the past week.—Our lumber exports for the past three months exceed those of the same period last year by fourteen per cent. Two-thirds of it went to Peru.—Seiby got sixty-two delegates in San Francisco to the Convention—beyond the most sanguine expectations.—The disabled steamer California is to be towed to San Francisco by the Idaho.—The city authorities of San José and the gas company have smoked the calumet of peace.—Capitalists propose starting a paper mill in Marysville.—There is a lady sign painter established in Hamilton, Nevada.—A sharp earthquake was felt at Healdsburg on the 19th June.—Brookshire Hotel, Napa county, was destroyed by fire last week.—The branch of the California Pacific Railroad running towards Bodega is rapidly progressing.—Violent rain, thunder and lightning at Volcano on the 22d.—Coach upset near Santa Cruz. Mr. Bosqui's shoulder dislocated, French Consul's collar bone broken, Italian Consul and wife both badly hurt. Gen. Cobb and daughter escaped with slight bruises.—Row in Chinadom; one Celestial killed. Officer Shimp shot in the hand.—Julia Kelly, six years old, fell off a wagon at the Almshouse and was instantly killed.—A lottery for the benefit of orphans is to be inaugurated in Sacramento.—French Monarchists desire to offer the throne to Count de Chaudard; if he declines, to Count de Paris.—Harry Meggs proceeds rapidly with the Peruvian Railroad. His brother proves an able assistant.—Oakland has raised a girl five years old that weighs 110 pounds.—A band of Gipsies are encamped on the Encinal, Alameda.—Governor Hoffmann laid the cornerstone of the new Capitol at Albany, N. Y., on the 24th instant.—Secretary Boutwell and Commissioner Pleasanton are at loggerheads; cause, the latter denies the right of the other's interference.—Seventy-five forty-niners meet to arrange matters for joining the procession on the Fourth of July.—It is expected the railroad to Red Bluff will be open in about three months.—The crops on Twitchell's Island are estimated at fifty bushels per acre.—San Luis Obispo stage upset; driver's leg broken.—A volcanic eruption has broken out on Black Mountain, near Lassen Buttes; lava is thrown up thirty feet, and bright flames issue, visible for miles around.—Another stage upset near Red Bluff, and badly injured three passengers.—Three hundred and fifty men are now engaged, within a circle of twenty miles, in the salmon fishery on the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers.—The Pacific Mail Company have applied to the Mexican Congress for a subsidy, provided they call at Mazatlan, Manzanillo and Acapulco each trip. They only ask $8,000 per month, and to be exempt from harbor dues.—An insane woman in St. Louis saturated her clothes with coal oil and then set fire to herself. She leaves a family of young children.—Packages and boxes of gold coin, registered as letters, and bearing postage, averaging $100 each, pass East daily from California.—The famine in Persia is horrible, the bodies of the dead frequently furnishing food for the living.—The Sheriff of Lewiston (Washington Territory) refused to hang Walters on the ground that the death sentence was illegal. A mob of men disguised as Indians took the condemned man from the jail and hung him. He made a desperate resistance.—Several children have died lately in Mississippi, it is supposed from eating mulberries in which locust eggs had been deposited.—It is reported that Consul-General Butler will be recalled from Egypt, being charged with mercenary, dishonest, and immoral practices.—An Eastern exchange, noting the approaching visit of Susan B. Anthony to the Pacific Coast, wickedly remarks that if it remains pacific after her advent, its chances of perpetual peace are first rate.—U. S. Treasurer Spinner was disgusted at being kept waiting by the Rothschilds at their office, and informed them that they were more courteous to dogs in America.—Henry Clay's old home, Ashland, has been purchased by the University of Kentucky for $90,000.—Woodhull & Claflin threaten to sue the New York Tribune for calling them free-love brokers.—Wilkie Collins has postponed his lecturing tour in America, owing to the state of his health.—The late hail storm in Vermont attacked a railway train with such fierceness that the locomotive, with all the energy of 130 pounds of steam, required twenty minutes to move the cars a mile.—If there is any one thing we admire more than another, it is youthful precocity, and here is a beautiful example of that charming feature in our city life: Youthful Hoodlums playing in the cheerful neighborhood of Cemetery Avenue have a little unpleasantness. Offended party procures a revolver and pops his adversary, a child of seven, in the leg. No warrant, and this desperate character is still at large.—Our friend, Judge Sawyer, has been again overruled in the "keno" matter. The heavy men of the Supreme Court have decided that "keno" is an unlawful game. Things are rather mixed, eh, Judge?—The Antioch Ledger says that from ten to forty Chinamen arrive there every evening by steamer, who are employed on the islands in that vicinity in leveling.—There is at present an unusual amount of travel between Nevada and California.—A bank has been organized at Gilroy, with a capital of $100,000.—A bolt of lightning entered a house at Brooklyn (N. Y.), the other day, and perforated a pile of China plates without breaking or dislodging any of them, after which it meandered into an adjoining closet and set a demijohn of whisky on fire.—The senior class of Amherst College have shown their sense and appreciation of the discomforts of the audience on commencement day by petitioning the faculty to limit the number of speakers to eight.—The Democratic agony is over, and Haight is the name of the child, as Post Card, with his inevitable sagacity, predicted two weeks ago. The star "Anti-Subsidy" is thus seen in high ascendant in the Democratic horizon. But, after all, the silver-haired chief (which his name is McCoppin) is not Sedanned—that is to say, though eulched so far as the Governorship is concerned, he has succeeded in his strategic game of "massing" the San Francisco delegation so as to secure a big say on all the nominations below those of Governor and Lieutenant-Governor.—So far as the Democrats are concerned, the railroad folks are beaten. If Booth gets the Republican nomination, then the fight will be one in which Stanford & Co. will take no interest. Just now the prospect is that Booth is the coming man.—German cavalry are to turn out in the Fourth of July procession. Now for a dose of allegory.—President Grant starts for California about the 15th of August. All the members of his Cabinet accompany him.—News from Fort Yuma says two United States mails from Tucson are overdue at that place. ### Interesting Marriage Statistics.

A contemporary gives some curious marriage statistics, from which impatient youths and desolate old maids and bachelors may both take heart. During the year 1869 seven maidens were married at the age of 14, and no fewer than 41 at the comparatively mature age of 15. The lads are not so venturesome as the girls, the youngest husband having wedded at 16 to a wife of the same age. On the other hand, an old maid of 78 found a husband, and four other women were married after they had passed the age of 70. One man of 32 was married, for the sixth time, to a maiden of 30; also, another man, for the sixth time, to a widow of 62, it being her second marriage. The ages of the oldest parties married for the first time were the male and female 60 each. The greatest disparity in the first marriage was the male 67 and the female 30. Forty-five males were married during the year who were over 70, and one widower of 80 was united for the second time to a widow of 54, it being also her second marriage. A widower of 30 was married for a second time to a young widow of 20, it being her fourth marriage! But one marriage is reported where both parties were married for the fourth time each, their ages being 73 and 63. There was also one marriage, the male being 73, his fourth marriage, to a widow of 57, her third marriage. One male of 29 was united to a widow of 30, it being his first marriage and her fourth. A widower of 56 was united to a widow of 52, it being her fifth marriage. The sixth marriage of a male is reported at the age of 32 to a spinster of 30. A second marriage of a man of 56 is reported to a female of 52, it being her fifth venture.

—The German Reichstag is represented as being eager to settle upon Prince Bismarck and Count Moltke one million thalers each. Bismarck peremptorily declined at first, but afterward consented, lest his refusal should entail upon Moltke the necessity of refusing also. Then Moltke peremptorily declined, but has now consented, lest his refusal should put Bismarck's acceptance in a bad light. We have at some time heard of craftier coquetting than this, but it must have been in some former state of existence. We are wholly unable to recall anything in this life which at all approaches it in sublimity of acuteness.

—About two hundred white Christian brutes the other day enjoyed a spectacle peculiarly suited to their gentle civilization, and one of the products of it. It was a lunatic of their own race, savagely pounding an inoffensive Chinaman. The appearance of the suffering Celestial, as he dragged himself away, is described as eminently satisfactory to the white Christian soul. His head was bereft of most of its hair, and of several broad flakes of scalp; his clothes were limp with blood, and most of his features had gone a-gipsying. "As ye feel that others ought to do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

—The contract for burying the indigent dead of this city has been awarded to Mr. McGinn. He is to inhumate saints and sinners alike, at five dollars and twenty-four cents a corpse. He desires to say that any mistakes upon the part of his employers will be rectified upon the Day of Resurrection. For example, if any pauper shall be crowded into a hole too short for him, let him bear the discomfort as patiently as he may, and file his claim for damages when he gets out. It won't do him any good to come spiritually fooling about Mr. McGinn at night.

—A letter, says the telegraph, is published from Chief Justice Chase to Valandigham, thanking him for his "new departure." He has lately made a newer departure, and we thank him for that.

The Vengeance Year.

"Death, is it only death the spectre we dread may come?
 Fall not darker shadows at times on the poor man's home?
 Come not strange forebodings across us whenever we press
 Bride or daughter in loving arms, lest this be the last caress?
 Lest the pure eyes coyly drooped, the low tones endlessly sweet,
 Eyes that lighten to see to us, voice that softens to greet,
 Be but quarry for courtly sport, the prey of the tyrant's lust,
 While we bow the heavy head, and bear as the peasant must!
 Day that our fathers prayed for, when all the wretched should rise,
 Day of combat and victory, is this thy star in the skies?
 Still the darkness is round us, and scarcely who aids us we know,
 Scarcely discern the battle, but grope to close with the foe:
 If we strike a brother to earth, not reading the doubtful sign,
 Brother, who wouldst have died for us, forgive us, the cause is thine.
 If we strike in the flush of wrath when the field is gained and sure,
 Blame not ye who know our past: is the blood that flows so pure?
 Surely the tavern, the midnight brawl, the vices that stain and sear,
 Have had richer harvest from France than we in our vengeance-year!"

The Presidential Cow.

The itemizers at Long Branch, being short of sensation material for a paragraph, have fallen back upon the President's cow, which has arrived there with the rest of the government traps, for a summer vacation. Here is the sketch: "The President's cow, which he brought from Washington, is an object of a good deal of interest. I have had the honor of seeing her, but have not had an opportunity of interviewing her. However, I chance to be in possession of some facts concerning her opinions on matters in general. She is a small, sleek animal, and is blooded, of course. Her color is significantly black, but she has a white line over her back, and her maternal bosom also does honor to the Caucasian race. On her arrival at Long Branch all the cows about here paid her the greatest respect. Even now, as she passes along the road to and from her pasture every night and morning, all the cows in the adjoining fields regard her with envious respect. The multitude of local dogs which would soon worry to death any other unprotected kine coming from abroad skulk away from this cow queen and dare not so much as utter a growl. None but the daintiest of flies are permitted to ride on her neck. Mrs. Cow is about five years old."

The Great Poets.

Lord Neaves says: "Among the great poets, those who possess the most universal minds, seem to me to have been Shakespeare and Burns. Without at all meaning to put the two on the same platform—for what poet, if it be not Homer, can approach the unrivaled name of Shakespeare; we see in them both a many-sided mind, great alike in tragic and in comic power, strong in depicting the beautiful as well as the appalling, with the warmest love of nature and the deepest knowledge of the human heart. No man can study these two authors—and more especially, I think, no man can study them in connection together—without learning more truth, and gaining more lively perceptions of beauty and goodness, than the most varied intercourse with mankind could bestow upon ordinary minds. Some of their beautiful descriptions, wise sayings, or pathetic sentiments come over and goby heart from time to time, would in my opinion go far to confer that completeness of character which I think it is the great object of leisure and of literature to create."

— We are well pleased to note that the undertakers will turn out with hearses at the celebration of our national independence. Each hearse will contain a coffin, and each coffin a corpse. The banner of the guild will be a black flag, displaying a death's-head and crossbones, with the motto "Put me in my little bed," and the drivers of the hearses will wear shrouds and crape. Altogether the effect will be inspiring. Any persons having relatives freshly dead upon that day, and who may be willing to loan the bodies for the purpose specified above, will confer a favor by sending the day to this office, care of Towne Cryer, undertaker. He will undertake to make a cold luncheon of it.

A Neat Invention.—Pocket pencil lights have just been patented. They are made of German silver. On rubbing the point it ignites and burns with a steady flame. A slight turn of the screw extinguishes it. When again wanted, the screw is turned the reverse way, and the point again rubbed or pressed on a hard substance. A new core is supplied when required at any time in a similar manner to the leads of patent pencils.

War Against War--The Lesson of the Joint High Commission.

In September, 1868, the third Congress of the International Labor Association assembled at Brussels. It was composed of over one hundred delegates, representing organized labor leagues in England, France, Prussia, Belgium, Switzerland, and most of the principal cities of Europe. From the United States there came to the Congress a letter of sympathy, in the name of the National Labor Union, offering coöperation. The sessions were calm and orderly, and the tone of the discussions was thoughtful and decorous. There was no rant or windy declamation about the wrongs of labor and the tyranny of capital; and so far as we can judge from such reports of the proceedings as we have had access to, the debaters evinced more knowledge and study of the subjects discussed than is indicated by our National legislators in the discussions in Congress. One delegate introduced a resolution to put an end to war by a concerted refusal of the working classes to accept military service, and made a speech, pitched in the key note of Byron's apothegm,

"War is a game, that were the people wise, Kings should not play at."

The sentiment that pervaded the entire body was bitterly opposed to an appeal to arms as a mode of settling international disputes, and found expression in the words of a French workingman who closed the debate, "Guerre a la Guerre!" Opposition on the part of the industrial classes, to war as a means of settling international disputes, has gained great additional strength since the time when it was agitated in the International Congress. In a former article in the News Letter, we alluded to a remarkable lecture, delivered in April last before the British Peace Society by Professor Seeley, the author of Ecce Homo, in which he proposed to organize a great Confederation for the abolition of war, to be called "The United States of Europe." The Professor, recognizing the fact that it is idle to talk of abolishing war without proposing a substitute and equivalent for it, went into the details of the subject and endeavored to present what he considered a feasible and statesmanlike scheme providing practical contrivances to meet practical difficulties. He insisted first, that the international system wanted is something essentially different from the existing system by which European affairs are sometimes settled in Congresses of the Great Powers; Second, that it demands a federation of all the Powers that are to share in its benefits, and Third, that it cannot succeed without a federation possessing legislative, judicial and executive powers similar to those wielded by the Federal Government at Washington with reference to the States of the Union. In other words, Professor Seeley proposes that the European Powers should establish a general government, having the same power to prevent or settle disputes between France and Prussia, England and Russia, or any other of its members, that the United States Government has in controversies between California and Oregon, or New York and New Jersey. We will not undertake at present to discuss the feasibility of such a scheme. Our object is simply to note the significant fact that in various quarters of the civilized world the minds of thinking men are engaged in the solution of this great problem. Contemporaneously with the delivery of Professor Seeley's lecture, Charles Sumner presented a memorial to the U. S. Senate praying that body to take the initiative in the settlement of international disputes by a High Court of Arbitration. Since then the success that has attended the labors of the Joint Commission, seems to lend additional strength to the position of those who indulge the hope that some plan may be devised by which war between civilized countries may be abolished.

"I'm With You Once Again."

"Our Eugene," the favorite of the California Democracy, our only sober Senator, is back from Washington, and the Democracy have welcomed him with open arms. The Democracy greet him with a serenade, and from his hotel balcony he responds in strains of characteristic eloquence. Hear him: "Among you, for twenty-one years, has been my home; and among you shall be my grave." (Applause.) "You complain that business is flat here. I assure you it is inconceivably flatter at the East." (What subtle flatter-y!) "They boast of their strawberries at the East. We, who never boast, have bigger strawberries all the year round—all the year round, fellow-citizens." (Sensation and cheers.) "Need I allude, fellow Democrats, to our mines and vines, our mammoth squashes and giant pines?" (No, no; we've heard all that; tell us about politics!) "They have men at the East, and giants at the West; but I can lay my hand upon my heart and assure you that, in crossing the five great water courses that intervened between the National Capital and San Francisco, I saw neither men nor giants that were not pigmies compared with you. Our climate!"—(O, dry up about the climate; how about Chinese immigration?) "I have returned to take a part in the coming campaign." (Then, for God's sake, talk more to the point when you get onto the stump.) "I shall not spare my energies nor my breath, and I promise you that you shall have more cause to complain of the tediousness of my speeches than of their brevity." (Groans, and cries of "the h—ll you say!") "I will not on this occasion allude to my course in the Senate." (Oh! oh! it's nothing to speak of.) "Fellow Democrats, the fatigues of my long transcontinental journey admonish me that it is time to conclude." (Bully for you! Nobody objects.) "And so good night!" (Curtain.)

Death of Sir John Herschel.

Sir John Frederick William Herschel, the renowned astronomer, died on Thursday, May 23, at his seat at Collingwood, near Hawkhurst, Kent. He was born in 1792, and was the only son of Sir Frederick William Herschel, the celebrated astronomer, and first president of the Royal Astronomical Society of England. Very early in life he gave proof of the possession of those faculties which have rendered the name of Herschel illustrious in the annals of science. Educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, he distinguished himself there by his high mathematical genius, and graduated B.A. in 1813, being senior wrangler and Smith's prizeman. From the time of leaving college he occupied himself in mathematical studies, his first work of note being "A Collection of Examples of the Application of the Calculus to Finite Differences," published at Cambridge in 1820. After his father's death, in 1822, he cooperated with Sir James South, using his father's instruments, in a re-examination of the nebulae and clusters of stars discovered by his father, the result of which was described by him in a catalogue presented to the Royal Society, and published in their "Transactions," in 1823. In addition to his astronomical work, there appeared by him, in 1830, a "Treatise on Sound;" in 1831, a "Treatise on the Theory of Light;" both published in the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana;" and his celebrated "Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy," published in Lardner's "Cyclopædia" in the latter year. In 1836 was published in Lardner's "Treatise on Astronomy." In 1834 Herschel went to the Cape of Good Hope and began his survey of the heavens, continuing his observations until May 1838. In 1847, nine years after his return to England, he published a large quarto volume entitled "Results of Astronomical Observations made during 1834-38 at the Cape of Good Hope: being the Completion of a Telescopic Survey of the Whole Surface of the Visible Heavens, commenced in 1825." Besides this tremendous work, his stay at the Cape benefited also meteorology; for while there he suggested a plan for simultaneous meteorological observations made at different places. In 1848 he was elected President of the Royal Astronomical Society. Sir John married, in 1828, the daughter of the Rev. Alexander Stewart, D.D., of Strathgarry, Perthshire. He is succeeded by his eldest son, now second baronet, William James, born in 1833, who entered the Bengal Civil Service in 1853, and is now magistrate and collector of Midnapore.

A Funny Story about a Safe Safe.

An ingenious mechanic in New Orleans constructed a safe which he declared to be absolutely burglar-proof. To convince the incredulous of the fact, he placed a one thousand dollar bill in his pocket, had himself locked in the safe, with a liberal supply of provisions, and the key cast into the river, declaring that he would give the money to the man who unfastened the door. All the blacksmiths, and carpenters, and burglars in the State of Louisiana have been boring and blasting, and beating at that safe for a week with every kind of tool and explosive mixture known to science, and the man is in there yet! He has whispered through the key-hole that he will make the reward $10,000 if somebody will only let him out. He has convinced everybody that it is the safest safe ever invented. Fears are entertained that the whole concern will have to be melted down in the blast furnace before he is released, and efforts are to be made to pass in through the key-hole a fire-proof jacket, to protect the inventor while the iron is melting.

—The honors accorded to Patrick Rafferty O'Blank and Teddy Finnerty O'Dash, whose real names have escaped our memory like a neck relieved from the halter, remind us that we have an amiable weakness for Fenian exiles. They usually labor under the social disadvantage of being also convicted cut-throats and incendiaries, but if the doctrine of the freedom of the will is a humbug (and we believe it is), they are not to blame for that. If the being a scoundrel disqualified a man for active patriotism, the personal property of oppressors would be disgracefully secure, and the women and babes of tyrants might never experience the refined felicity of being brained and disemboweled. It is tolerably obvious that such a state of things would be dull. And so we bless God for the existence of Fenian patriotism, and having still half a lungful of breath on hand, we employ it in praising Him, also, for favoring us with scorpions and rattlesnakes.

Another Theological Lion—According to a report extensively circulated in the European journals, Dr. Dollinger, the great excommunicated, is about to visit England, and afterwards the United States, accompanied by Père Hyacinthe. Has this movement any connection, we wonder, with the declaration attributed to the latter that "the time for words is gone, and the time for action is come," which is said to have caused some uneasiness at Rome? It really looks as if an attempt were contemplated to organize a schism.

Water Truth.—Every drop in the sea of life imagines itself an ocean.

A Vision.

DEAR NEWS LETTER:—I had a vision. I saw seventeen Chinamen chasing an Irishman, and I was glad. I saw the seventeen joined by seventeen millions, and I was correspondingly elated. Finally, the foremost, a mere lad, got the fugitive by the leg, and another stripling swotted him across the pate with a piece of board so that he died. It is needless to add that I sniggered tumultuously. A change came over the spirit of my dream. The Irishman's corpse lay stiffened on a slab, and Dr. Li Po Tai sawed open the head. Then seven Chinamen came up and stuck their dirty fingers into the opening. They nodded and sat down on the body. A chicken was brought in and decapitated, some joss-sticks were lighted and burned with a villainous smell, and the seven Chinamen swore seven great oaths. After this they smoked opium uninterruptedly, and the boys that had swotted the Irishman brought in the piece of board and testified that they did the swotting, and were rather proud of it than otherwise. The seven jurymen laughed, and so did I. Then they rendered a verdict, and it was translated to me. It read thus: "We the undersigned jurymen, convened to inquire into the cause of the death of Dennis O'Shaughnessy, do find that deceased was a native of Ireland, aged thirty, and that he came to his death by being welted on the crust by these two dam little Chinamen, who ought to be hanged!" No sooner was the verdict rendered than the two offenders were strung up higher than a kite. A change came over the spirit of my dream. I wept. Just then some one made a devil of a racket in the kitchen, and it waked me. I jumped out of bed, went to the tool house and selected a nice heavy pick handle. With this I sought the Irish servant girl, and I walloped that hateful female till she had to be taken up on the dust-pan. You never saw a girl smashed so fine!

The "News Letter" in London.

There is no paper published in the United States that wields so powerful an influence in London, especially in financial circles, as the San Francisco News Letter. British capitalists rely upon it as an authority in all matters of commerce and finance. A few lines in the News Letter sufficed to give the coup de grâce to "Berton Vice-Consul of France's" wretched sham, known as the "Mining Bureau." It was News Letter that warned British capitalists against the plausible blandishments of the French "Vice Consul at Sacramento," and blocked his little confidence game; and we propose in the future, as in the past, to keep an eye on all dubious schemes and enterprises of a similar character, and put foreign capitalists on their guard against them.

— It is stated that two unknown women placed flowers upon the grave of Ruloff, the murderer, but that the act gave offense to some persons, and the flowers were removed. We hardly know which to admire most, the "tender and mournful sentiment" that decorates the dirt upon the carcass of an assassin, or the severe morality that could take offense at the display. Both are extremely beautiful, for the same reason that much other sentimental stuff and brutal bosh are esteemed extremely beautiful; namely, because they are extremely human. Together, they remind us of the holy rites of Decoration Day, and our own barbarity in ridiculing them. But where is the "audacious orator" who showed us up?

— The Oakland News, which has of late been edited with conspicuous intelligence and refreshing gentlemanliness, pays the Town Crier some very graceful compliments, and concludes by expressing an apprehension that upon reading them he will smash the writer. Not at all; the T. C. finds in this kind of literature a peculiar merit for which he has vainly sought in all ancient and modern works, and which meets his unqualified approval. As something to take along at funerals, the light and entertaining article in the News is peerless; and the T. C. thinks it is not too much to say that a perusal of it would go far to dispel the deep gloom of sitting up with the corpse of a creditor.

— Some people argue—very logically, too—it is impossible to keep your word if you give it. A man who cuts his heirs off with a shilling need not necessarily use a silver razor. An Irishman calls his sweetheart honey because she is beeloved. An honest banker sometimes fails in making money, but a dishonest one makes money by failing. There is little encouragement for a lady to be charitable, because, after all, she can only be called a kind woman, while the rest of her sex are still womankind. When is a soldier not half a soldier? When he's in quarters.

Railroad Progression.—An advertisement of a railway in Pennsylvania in 1832 reads thus: "The engine with a train of cars will run daily, when the weather is fair, commencing to-day. When the weather is not fair, the horses will draw the cars."

Dog Ham.

T. T. Cooper, late agent for the Chamber of Commerce at Calcutta, says in his "Travels of a Pioneer of Commerce:" While waiting for the return of the coolie, Philip and myself breakfasted at a fine tea shop, the proprietor of which, thinking that his customer was a Mandarin, prepared an elaborate meal, consisting of a number of dishes, and among others, fried dog ham! I proceeded with stoical fortitude to taste doggie. One taste led to another, and resulted in a verdict for reason; for in summing up, after a hearty meal, I pronounced the dog ham to be delicious in flavor, well smoked, tender, and juicy. The landlord having heard that the Yangjen, as that test had discovered me to be, had conquered his prejudice, brought in the ham to show me. It was very small—not much bigger than the leg of a good-sized sucking pig; the flesh was dark, and the hair had been carefully removed, while the paw had been left as a stamp of its genuineness, as the proprietor remarked. Dog hams are justly considered a great delicacy in China, and as such bring a very high price, costing as much as five taels per pound. They are chiefly cured in the province of Hoonan, where dogs of a peculiar breed are fattened for the purpose.

The New City Hall.

What are the new City Hall Commissioners doing? At least three-fourths of the community are anxious to see the foundations laid, and it is very hard that a factious opposition of less than one-fourth of our citizens should be allowed to hamper their progress in the good work. We want a City Hall now. We shall need it more when the new building is completed. At present the various offices appertaining to the municipality are scattered in hired rooms, ill adapted to their purpose, all over the city, and rented at prices that form a large item in the city expenditure. That the Hall must be built sooner or later, is inevitable. Why then delay that which, when completed, will relieve us of a yearly and unnecessary tax.

Meteorite Stone.—One of the largest, if not the very largest, meteoric masses that ever fell was one which descended in Oswego county, New York, in June, 1859. It struck the earth about four A.M. with a crash and shock that awakened the inhabitants at a distance of five miles. It covered nearly half an acre of land, and was at some points seventy feet high. Many fragments broken by the fall were thrown a distance of over half a mile.

American Style.—We find in a London paper of recent date the following item of fashionable intelligence, which will possess the charm of novelty for readers on this side the Atlantic: "The latest style at a dinner party, in America, is to have a fan placed at each lady's plate, on which is printed the bill of fare, and on the side of which is a small looking-glass, so that she is able to survey herself and keep cool."

— An Indiana man has effected a strategical combination against the potato bugs. He planted a grain of corn in each hill of potatoes. The corn came up before the potatoes, which, of course, cheated the little pests into the belief that it was a cornfield, and they never went near the potatoes until it was too late to do any damage. His crop of the esculent is, therefore, the envy of his neighbors.

Real Estate Transactions.—The records of the Mercantile Agency of Messrs. Hope, McKillop & Co., show that during the week ending June 15, 1871, the total number of deeds recorded in the city and county of San Francisco was 70, the aggregate consideration being $101,480; the number of mortgages was 43 for $442,683; 44 releases for $96,447.

— The Alameda Beet Sugar Factory is now engaged in refining Peruvian sugar, at the rate of ten tons per day. The company expect to soon commence the manufacture of fine crushed sugar, at a less expense than by the old process, and consequently to the great advantage of consumers.

— Why must a Yankee speculator be very subject to water on the brain? Because he has always an ocean (a notion) in his head.

— The skeleton of a giant, twelve feet high, is the curiosity at Jefferson, Ind. Probably the cardiff's grandfather.

Special Brevities.

— In a recently published sermon, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher thus fairly indicates the state of thought upon the subject of Darwinism: "Although there is much yet to be made known, it seems to me that all thinking men who have taken the trouble to inform themselves about these facts believe in the theory of evolution, or that the theory by which God created the world and the races consists in the development, the unfolding of everything from some anterior and less perfect state. . . . Although many of the later applications of the theory of development require ripening, yet they foreshadow, I think, if not the very truth, yet the direction in which the truth lies; and we may as well prepare ourselves to accept it. For one, I am ready."

— At Coatbridge, Scotland, a starling lately built a nest in an empty compartment of a dove cot, consisting of seven or eight holes, the remainder being occupied by pigeons. The starling had great difficulty in building her nest, owing to the decided opposition of the pigeons. The other day, while the starling was out foraging for her young, a pigeon planted itself boldly at the entrance of the starling's domicile to prevent her entrance. On the starling's arrival, she was driven off. She flew away, but returned in a few minutes, and, hovering above the dove cot, let fall a stone so smartly that every pigeon flew away. She has since had peace.

— An Ohio paper thus describes an effort by one of Ohio's legislative orators: "Mr. Acker thrilled the House on Saturday with one of his most majestic efforts. A reporter speaks of the scene as indescribable. Ladies on the back seats were obliged to climb up to the back of the chairs to escape the torrents of eloquence. The speaker was so charged with the electricity of eloquence that his sharply-pointed spike-tail coat frequently stood at an angle of sixty degrees, and trembled like an aspen. The orator most of the time resembled an irresponsible victim in galvanic slippers."

— According to returns recently published, the population of New South Wales was numbered at 485,356, and the area at 206,999,680 acres. The area under wheat was 189,452 acres; under barley and bere, 9,152 acres; under oats, 17,302; under rye, 2,378; under maize, 128,041; and under other kinds of grain, 134 acres, making a total of 346,459 acres of land under corn crops. Potatoes occupied 17,133; sugar cane, 3,918; tobacco, 366; vineyard, 3,907; and grass for hay, 75,034 acres. These statistics refer to the years 1869-70.

— According to the St. Pancras and Holborn Journal persons who are receiving out-door relief have made it a practice to go to the butchers who contract for meat, and ask for certain portions to be cut off, and, when served, to produce their relief ticket, and offer to pay the difference between the value of the ticket and the price of the meat. The Holborn guardians were told that it was impossible sometimes to detect these people, for they came to the butchers' shops with obignons on and in velvet jackets.

— A small steamer named the Explorador has had a trial trip on the Thames. She is designed to make one of the most interesting series of explorations ever undertaken in South America. Ascending the Amazon, she will be rolled around the rapids of the Madeira river, and will then penetrate far into the interior of Bolivia and the Brazilian province of Matto Grosso; while up the great river Manuata she may reach almost to the famed city of Incas, Cuzco.

— Many of the great French merchants and manufacturers are giving up business in France and preparing to settle in Spain, Belgium and England. A notable instance is in the case of M. Schneider, the President of the last Imperial Chamber, who was the owner of perhaps the largest iron works in the world—at Creuzot, and who is about to commence operations upon a very large scale at Stockton-on-Tees.

— George Walcott, who killed a soldier at Frankfort, Kentucky, some time since, and for whose arrest a reward of $500 was offered, had himself arrested by a friend, who drew the reward and gave it to Walcott, the latter immediately giving the money to the widow of his victim. He was drunk when the murder occurred.

— An Erie paper notices the establishment of a saloon for the dispensing of ice-cream, and urges all of its readers who like "this delicious bivalve" to call there. We suppose ice-cream is served up at that saloon raw, stewed and on the half-shell.

— The following dialogue in one of the coaches of a first-class car is very "Frenchy": "My little angel," asks a fond husband, "are you comfortable in your corner?" "Yes, thanks." "You do not feel the cold?" "Not at all." "Your window closes easily?" "Very nicely, dear." "Then come and take my place."

— The pigeon killing industry is so thriving in Wisconsin that from 10,000 to 30,000 birds are daily forwarded on the midnight trains east, and one man has paid over $1,000 to the express company for charges on this kind of merchandise.

— An artesian well 350 feet deep, sunk on the alkali district 800 miles west of Omaha, is a success, a plentiful supply of pure water being obtained for the use of the locomotives.

— A narrow gauge railroad is to be erected in Green county, Tenn. The cost is only $20,000, or about $1,800 per mile. The gauge to be 30 inches.

— The Economist says: "Mr. Lowe rather astonished the House of Commons not long ago by telling them that we are paying off our debt much more quickly than is commonly believed, and that, as a proof of it, we paid off as much as £10,000,000 since so short a time ago as 1st of April, 1868. An account showing this to be so has now been laid on the table of the House. But these figures do not tell us that since 1868 we have increased our debt $7,300,000 to pay for the telegraphs. And this happily is a debt of a peculiar nature. It is a debt counterbalanced by a property. Formerly the State was liable on Consols and interest-bearing debt; now it is liable on a debt in the ledger on which it pays no interest. The annual charge is diminished; but, except so far as the unclaimed balances go, the liability to repay the principal sum, or the equivalent to it, remains just where it was. If we deduct this peculiar item in the account, we have really paid off £11,888,846 in four years, which is at the rate of £2,972,212 a year, an amount of repayment which is very satisfactory, especially considering that our expenditure has in these years been very large, and which under all probable circumstances ought, as a matter of national policy, to be at least maintained, if not increased.

— To a considerable extent the body adapts itself to the requirements of each climate. Volney went so far in saying that climate determines physiognomy, as to see in the negro a face acted upon by sunlight and heat, with overhanging eyebrows, half-closed eyelids, raised cheek and projecting jaws; while another writer, Mr. Stanhope Smith, has, upon the same principle, made Jack Frost answerable for the short, broad, hard-featured face of the Tartar, by contracting his eyebrows and eyelids, raising his cheeks, and compelling him to keep his mouth shut as much as possible. Certain it is that the native Peruvian, living at heights of from 7,000 to 15,000 feet above the level of the sea, becomes broad-chested by need of a large development of lung. A certain quantity of oxygen the blood requires from the air, and more room is wanted to take in a sufficient bulk of the more rarefied air.

— The Figaro says that a Republic has been sufficiently tried in France. The massacres of 1793, the insurrection of 1848, and the Commune of 1871 will disgust people with any but monarchical sentiments. The Times assures us that "four-fifths of the French people are prepared at the present time to welcome, or at least to acquiesce in a Monarchy." Undoubtedly a strong reaction towards Monarchy seems to be setting in, and the fusion of the Legitimist and Orleanist parties will give strength and coherence to it. Quite possibly, then, a constitutional Monarchy, based on the ascertained wishes of the country, will be the result, and within a very short time the streets of Paris may ring with cries of vive le Roi—nous terrons.

— Hood, in his Comic Annual for 1880, communicated the following from a contributor: "Sur, my wyl had a tom cat that dyd. Being a torture shell, and a great favorit, we had him berried in the guardian, and for the sake of enrichment of the sile, I had the carkiss lade under the roots of a guzberry bush. The frnte being up till then of the smooth kind. But the next sesons fruit after the cat was berried, the guzberries were all hairy, and more remarkabl, the catpillars of the same bush was all of the same hairy description."

— The following is given by Frank Buckland as the origin of ox-tail soup: At the end of the late war there were a great many French prisoners in England, and, by way of feeding them cheaply, the commissariat used to supply them with ox-tails, then considered an offal and left on the hides. The Frenchmen, with their usual cleverness in cooking, made these tails into soup; and this is the origin of ox-tail soup—a story which, I think, should not be forgotten."

— In England we find that in the time of Henry III. bread was made in three qualities, viz., reasted bread (fine wheat), cricket bread (seconds), bread of treat (brown bread); and strict and effective laws were laid down as to its being of certain weight and quality. Fraudulent bakers were driven about the city with the loaves tied round their necks, and subjected to sundry other coarse but rigorous punishments.

— Advice in love: Josh Billings gives some advice to a young lady as how she should receive a proposal: You ought to take it kind, looking down hill, with an expreshun about half tickled and half scart. After the pop is over, if yure luyver wants to kiss you, I don't think I would say yea or no, but let the thing kind ov take its own course.

— A letter was posted at a village post-office that had no postage-stamp on it, but in place of the stamp had the following written on one corner of the envelope: "Mr. Postmaster, don't charge no postage on this; the stamp wouldn't stick, so I tore the thing up."

— Dr. Morcan Morris, Sanitary Inspector of New York, reports that several horses have recently died in that city, after feeding on brewers' grains, and that chemical analysis shows that their death was caused by strychnine.—Medical Times and Gazette.

— It appears that the Commune had promised to pay 200,000 francs to whoever should bring M. Thiers alive into Paris. The German journals say that Marshal MacMahon having performed the task, ought to be paid this sum by the Commune.

— It is asserted that about one-third of the demented owe their insanity to disappointment in love. It is not clear which is the preferable mental condition: that resulting from disappointment, or that which renders disappointment possible.

— Iron Telegraph poles are in common use in Switzerland. They are durable, tasteful in design and economical. They are to be tried in the Atlantic States.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

— Money is plentiful at moderate rates, banks showing a willingness to discount good paper at short dates. Commercial banks charge from 10 to 12 per cent. on loans, but Savings Banks and Loan Societies as low as 9 to 10 per cent. on first-class security. The following local incorporations have paid dividends as annexed during the past month:

Name.	Rate.	Amount	Name.	Rate.	Amount

Natoma W. & M. Co. 1	3,000		Yellow Jacket M'g Co 2½	60,000
			Total.....	$487,243

Nearly all the foregoing incorporations paid similar dividends in the previous month. After an interval of a few months, dividends have been resumed by the California Powder Works. For the previous four months, Chollar-Potosi paid $10 per share each month. The dividend by the Crown Point mine is the first since September, 1868. The Greenville mine is in Plumas county, California, and the above is the first dividend. The Raymond & Ely mine did not pay a dividend in May. Classified, the disbursements for the past month compare as follows with the same month last year:

	1870.	1871.
California and Pacific Banks.....	$ 57,500	$ 57,500
Gas and Water Companies.....	85,000	90,000
Insurance Companies.....	7,000	8,000
Railroad Companies.....	7,500	5,000
Mining Companies.....	201,500	308,300
Miscellaneous Companies.....	61,583	18,443
Totals.....	$420,083	$487,243

During the same month in 1869 the amount disbursed was $421,000, against $587,900 for the same month in 1868 and $636,500 for the same month in 1867. Most of these amounts were from mining incorporations, $245,500 being paid by the same in June, 1869, $415,500 in June, 1868, and $514,000 in June, 1867.

— From the Commercial Herald we learn that arrangements are already made for the importation of Australian wool and tallow, and the export to those colonies of salmon, brooms, etc., in return. It is proposed by our contemporary to send a well-informed commercial man there who is competent to explain the great advantages derivable from a closer commercial intercourse. Australia is comparatively dependent upon America for many of her trans-oceanic supplies, and San Francisco is assuredly the best point from whence to ship them.

— Flaxseed continues to arrive from Oregon, and goes direct to the oil mill, under contract. The production of flax has largely increased upon this coast the last three years, we now producing enough to keep our linseed oil mill constantly employed, instead of importing several cargoes, as heretofore, from Calcutta and Chile; it is worth 30@3½c per pound. Beans are in large stock, not a little held by speculators at high cost; prices now low and nominal; sales quite out of the question.

— The ship Sonntag, for New York, in Moore & Co.'s line, has her full complement of freight engaged, consisting largely of California wines and other home products. The same parties have also chartered the ship Daniel Marcy to follow, while the Dispatch line has secured the Sovereign of the Seas for the same port.

— The demand for French brandies is on the decrease, the California grape brandy gradually taking their place. It is probable that some of the former will be reshipped for France, where, in view of the small products anticipated this year, they will be in demand.

— Hides and tallow both find greedy purchasers at very full prices. The arrival of seven more car-loads of swine from Des Moines, Iowa, had a very depressing effect upon the hog market, and caused a very serious decline in prices, which it will be hard to recover this summer.

— The lower rates of freights ruling on our coast steamers are tending rapidly to develop our domestic commerce, the increase of their carrying trade being beyond expectation.

JUNE 23, 1871.—Quick time and cheap fares from Australia, China and Japan to New York and Liverpool. The great trans-continental all-rail route, via Central and Union Pacific Railroad line, is now in complete running order from San Francisco to the Atlantic seaboard. Through express trains leave San Francisco daily, making prompt connection with the several railway lines in the Eastern States, for all the cities of the United States and Canada, connecting at New York with the several steamer lines to England, France, and all European ports. Through time going East—from San Francisco to Omaha, four days and six hours; to Chicago, five days and six hours; to New York, six days and twenty hours. Silver palace sleeping coaches, second to none in the world, are run daily from San Francisco to New York, and intermediate points. These drawing-room cars by day, and sleeping cars by night, are unexcelled for comfort and convenience to the passenger while en route, combining the elegance of a private parlor and all accommodations pertaining to a well-furnished chamber, with comfortable couches, clean bedding, etc. A competent porter accompanies each car, to attend to the wants of our patrons. Children not over twelve years of age, half fare; under five years of age, free. One hundred pounds of baggage per full passenger, free; fifty pounds of baggage per half passenger, free. Through ticket office, 422 California street, San Francisco. T. E. SICKLES, General Superintendent Union Pacific Railroad. A. N. TOWNE, General Superintendent Central Pacific Railroad. T. L. KIMBALL, General Passenger Agent, Omaha, Neb. T. H. GOODMAN, General Passenger Agent, Sacramento, Cal.

Maxim Gas Company.—In the New Letter of the 17th ultimo we noticed the success of this method of obtaining gas for household use at a very small cost per thousand feet. The difficulties which have hitherto interfered with the many plans adopted for the same purpose have been completely surmounted by this invention. The greatest of these arose from the more volatile portions of the gasoline passing off first, during which time a fine light was maintained, but as the denser portion came to be acted upon by the air which passed through, or over, or through fibrous material saturated with it, then its greater gravity, added to the decrease of temperature caused by evaporation, lessened the amount of vapor evolved, till an insufficient quantity was produced to maintain the number of lights required. Finally the residuum, or about one-fifth of the gasoline, became so dense as to be worthless for the purpose, and was a consequent loss. Mr. Maxim has succeeded in controlling the proportions of the mixture of gasoline and common air supplied to the burners, utilizing the pressure of the vapor itself, to supply the amount of air requisite. The principle applied is that of induction. A jet of vapor forced through a small opening and directed into the mouth of a pipe induces a current of air which accompanies and mixes with it. The proper relations as to size of the aperture and pressure of vapor, with the quantity of air required, are maintained by this elegant method, and constitute its principal feature. The Maxim machine is an air induction apparatus, and all others hitherto have been air blowing machines. It therefore dispenses with all blocks, pulleys and weights. The action is automatic, and continues, so long as the supply of gasoline is not exhausted, with the same steady supply of gas, and with perfect steadiness of light.

— Under the title of "Driftwood," some fat-sided cow is cutting capers in the Alta that remind one of nothing so much as—the capers of a fat-sided cow! Says this gabbling beef: "If the gods take care of Cato, we hope they will not forget the citizens of San Francisco, who are soon to have thirty-one prison birds let loose upon them." Now, Udderspraddle, we shall welcome those liberated canaries, the knavery of a thousand rogues would be a grateful relief after the folly of a single dunce like you. Orroint thee, thou sportive spouter of moral milk—thou horned horror stumping stoutly up the walks of wit! Thou cattle!

— The Oaklandites are making their regular annual riot anent the withdrawal of their militia to parade in San Francisco on the coming Fourth of July. May we be permitted to remind them that "the true greatness of a people is not to be sought in the camp of its heroes, but in the closets of its philosophers?"

— The oldest California postmaster has been discovered in Mr. At Lee, editor of the New Age, Odd Fellows' organ. But how the devil a Chinaman came to be appointed a postmaster, is as inscrutable a mystery as is his connection with Odd Fellowship and journalism. Will somebody rise to explain!

— A very thriving business has been carried on in London lately, in painting sparrows and selling them as canaries.

Love's Music.

Love held a harp between his hands, and, lo,
 The master-hand, upon the harp-strings laid,
 By way of prelude such a sweet tune played
 As made the heart with happy tears o'erflow!
 But sad and wilder did that music grow;
 And, like the wail of woods by storm-gusts swayed,
 While yet the awful thunder's wrath is stay'd,
 And earth lies faint beneath the coming blow,
 Still wilder waxed that tune, until at length
 The strong strings, strained by sudden stress and sharp
 Of that musician's hand intolerable,
 And jarred by sweep of unrelenting strength,
 Sunder'd, and all the music broken fell.
 Such was Love's music—lo, the Shatter'd Harp!

—Cornhill Magazine.

Communism.

"The Emperor of Germany and the advisers of his Majesty," a correspondent says, "consider they are the conservative protectors of continental order, the one power alone which can at present protect society from revolution, having its origin in the French politics of the Communism of the 'International.' The Berlin Government, you will find, is now exercising its influence in neighboring States, where certain classes of workmen have been taught revolutionary doctrines by the agents of the French International Workman's Associations, a combination and union which has more to do with political revolution, socialism, robbery and destruction of property, than the amelioration of the condition of the industrial classes. I have read a sketch of a report on the workings of the 'International' by a French diplomatist which will probably find its way to most of the European Cabinets eventually. The Government of Napoleon III. had collected much valuable information, and appears to have understood the aims of Socialistic Republicanism as brought to the surface by Assi. In principle it is a war against capital, invested interests, and property generally. It is a war against Sovereigns, aristocracy, landholders, all classes designated by the French demagogues as les riches. It is a war against religion, priests, and the Christian system of education which States have always encouraged in order to teach the youth of the country to respect such laws, divine as well as earthly, as can alone hold society together. Perhaps the high priests of these infernal doctrines never believed they would have such an exceptional opportunity of practicing their crimes as was brought about by events which gave them unlimited ammunition, and armed Paris—hundreds of thousands of National Guards recruited from the lowest classes of society and taught the use of a musket. The course of events has shown what is meant by Communism as the ideal of International Red Republicanism. Every European State has an interest in attacking this political pest. The destroying disease has shown itself in England, in Belgium, in Spain, in Italy, and even in Germany, and had the Commune triumphed in Paris, many other cities would have responded. The Belgian Chambers are the first to bring the subject in all its hideous nakedness before the world. A conversation has taken place in the Chambers of Belgium, in which the dangers which have arisen from the Paris Communists and French Republican Communism have elicited from the Government an assurance that no 'political refugees' of that class shall find protection in Belgium. The police of Belgium are more than ever on the qui vive in the coal districts especially, as those districts have long been worked by the agents of the Paris Commune."

— It is stated that the Canadians are in dead earnest about their one hundred and eighty million dollars' worth of railroad to Victoria. As the road is chiefly for the benefit of the Pacific colony, we would suggest the expediency of paying about one-fourth of its cost by selling all the real and personal property of the colonists.

— Marshal Ellis says it is optional with the butchers whether they parade on the Fourth of July in their carts, or on horseback. We should think it would be proper for them to go bullback, using a saddle of mutton and a bridle furnished with a bit of sausage.

— It is consoling to learn from an advertisement in the dailies that "Man Chong & Co. have taken Cun Sui as a partner, and have employed Mo Yok to attend to their business in Tuolumne county." Tuolumne will employ an Irish miner and another bull dog to attend to the business of Mo Yok.

— A man who was told by a clergyman to "remember Lot's wife," replied, that he had trouble enough with his own, without remembering other men's wives.

The Cricket Match--California vs. H. M. S. "Zealous."

This cricket match was played last Saturday, at the Recreation Grounds, and proved an exceedingly interesting one, although it was evident that both sides were somewhat out of practice. Some very good play was, however, shown both in batting and fielding, and the promoters of this glorious game are now doing their best to revive the interest which, until the last eighteen months, was generally felt in this community. Many causes might be assigned why cricket has for nearly two years been allowed to fall to the ground, but the News Letter prefers uttering hopes for its future firm establishment to growling at what cannot be helped. In this temperate climate, out-door sports like cricket should be freely indulged in; and if this were done there would be fewer dyspeptics and hypocondriacs whose cadaverous countenances indicate "cocktails" and general lethargy. Having thus reproached our young men, the News Letter expects to see different doings from henceforth. Our esteemed English Consul has expressed himself much in favor of the establishment of Cricket Clubs, and of late several absent cricketers who were wont to take much interest in the game have returned to California; amongst others, we notice our respected citizens, Messrs. Henry Fox and W. J. Macdougall, who, assisted by such players as Messrs. Marshall, Chisholm, Salter, et alæ, will no doubt take the matter in hand. In the present match, the Zealous Eleven made in their first innings, 41; in their second, 83--total, 124; against the first innings of the California Eleven (118), who won with 10 wickets to go down. Of the Zealous Eleven, the best batting was made by Messrs. Byrch, Wilmot, Taylor and Gravener, all of whom batted with much care and precision, notwithstanding that their scores were moderate. Had these gentlemen been in good practice, we believe the scores would have looked very different. The Zealous Eleven fielded also very creditably, and Lieutenant Wilmot made a most brilliant left-hand catch; the bowling of Messrs. Byrch and Gravener was also very effective, although the former (a powerful, fast "round-arm") would now and then bowl a little "wild." Of the California Eleven's score, Messrs. Marshall, Macdougall and Fisher were the chief contributors. Mr. Marshall made 52, "not out," in really fine style, and at the conclusion of the innings was carried off the field on the shoulders of his comrades. He plays a clear, free, forward play, very low, and with a good square bat. Mr. Macdougall played a long and careful innings for 16, and he and Marshall, being in together, kept the field "alive" for some time. Fisher came next, with a well-earned 10. The fielding of "our" Eleven was also very creditable--Davis catching Sunderland neatly with his left hand, and Macdougall catching Byrch cleverly at "point." The bowling of Mr. Davis was excellent, he having taken three wickets the first over. Mr. Chisholm also bowled with judgment, but his bowling, having evidently been "collared," should have been changed. If this had been done, California might have won in one innings; as it was, Messrs. Hilliard and Peel went in the second time for California, and, having made 7 without losing a wicket, won the game for the California Club, with 10 wickets to spare. The following is the score:

Little Sally.

You've a-beard me tell o' my Sally' Joe, Talk!—why, she talked like a purnted
 My 'cute, little bit of a Sal— book
 Lor' bless me! what is it a-chokin, me so— Afore she were scarcely three;
 She were but a shrimp of a gal— She could read like a passon afore she
 And 'ere I'm a hact'ully going to blub— was six,
 She's dead, that's all, old pal. She read Lloyd's regular to me.

I can mind the night that I picked her up, There ain't much sun in my cellar, Joe;
 'Twere in Linmerstone-lane, Shore- Nor light, for the matter of that;
 ditch; 'Twere really a sight more cheerier,
 I hadn't had bit nor sup all day, Along o' that little brat;
 Nor narra a chance of sich; She seemed to hact like a sunbeam, Joe;
 For the fruit trade were mighty bad then, She were better nor gas, that's flat.

Joc, She called me "Daddy"—'twere just as
 As yer knows the meanin' of which. well—

But I coudden have passed a dog that I christened her Sally, yer know;
 night, I courted a gal with that very name,
 For 'twas cold, and a-snowin' quite Close on forty year ago;
 thick; She died—there, don't look at me, pard-
 So I takes the breathin' bundle up, ner, don't!

And hurries off home with it, quick; I'm a silly old duffer, Joe.

And sent Missis Hodges's 'Lizabeth out The luck she brought me were sum'tut
 For a 'aporth o' milk, on tick. strange,

Well, Joe, yer may think it strange, old I comed upon brighter days;
 man, I'm certain she made me a better man,
 What I tells yer about the kid; With her purty, innocent ways;
 But the baby she seemed to take to me, I'd lay she'd do yer a lot more good
 And she kicked, and she crowed, she Than those blokes in black what prays.

And I relished my bit o' dry toke that I had the parish doctor, Joe, night, And I think that he done his best:
 As tho' it had cost me a quid. But 'twere when I sat a-holdin' her 'and,
 From that time forrard, Joe, hup she That my darlin' were most at rest;
 grewed, And she died, old pal, with her little head
 A-nussed, so to speak, by shares; A-leanin' upon my breast.

Lor' bless 'ee, man, they was nuts on her, It's hard to think that she's gone right off,
 The women what lived up stairs, And it's strange why she had to go;
 And, God knows, they often had trouble She were doin' good in this wicked world, enough She were wanted here below;
 Lookin' arter their own affairs. Why shouldn't we have some angels here?

'Ow purty she growd up—bless her 'art! But there, we must leave it, Joe.

Court Chat.

—A charming anecdote worthy of the ancient days of chivalry is being whispered about amongst the higher circles in London. It seems that one of our young Catholic heroes of high life, always a great admirer of the Empress Eugenie, paid a visit to Chiselhurst last week previous to his departure for Paris. "What can I bring your Majesty from Babylon?" (the name by which the doomed city is always designated now by the Ultramontane party), said the young nobleman, as he bent low over her Majesty's fair hand. "Nothing," replied the Empress, sadly; then suddenly correcting her speech said quietly, "Yes, there is one thing I should love. Bring me a rose from the garden of the Tuileries!" The young man promised to execute this apparently easy commission, and departed in sadness. Yesterday he reappeared at Chiselhurst with a case of purple morocco in his hand, which he reverently presented on bended knee to the Empress. It was the Golden Rose, gift of the Pope to Her Majesty, that he had brought "from the Tuileries." How he had obtained it, or through what long course of adventure he had traced it to the party willing to part with it, will never be known, nor yet at what sacrifice it was obtained. But great was the joy of the illustrious lady on beholding it, and pardonable the feeling which induces her to hope that it will bring a blessing to last to her house and stay the wrath of Heaven. It had always formed part of the altar decorations of the chapel at the Tuileries.

—A recent visitor to Chiselhurst publishes in an American paper some curious particulars regarding the habits of the Imperial family. The Empress keeps a good deal to her private apartments, and seems to have completely changed in her disposition of mind. She is nervous and discontented with everything that happens around her, so that her temper begins to be the subject of general complaint at Chiselhurst, and the Emperor himself seems to suffer from it more than any one else. Even the little Prince does not see his mother as often as formerly. The Emperor dines quite en famille with the Empress and the Prince, and none of the courtiers are present either at dinner or in the evening, except occasionally. "Both he and the Empress," it is added, "were always very superstitious, and now consulting their fortune on the cards seem to be their chief occupation." What a subject for an historical painter.—London American Register.

— General Schenck, the new American Minister to England, was accompanied from America by his three daughters, Miss Luez, Miss Julia and Miss Sallie Schenck; also by General Nordhead, his private secretary; and the Hon. Mr. Fisher. They are now at the Alexandra Hotel, and receiving numerous visits and hearty congratulations. General Schenck is described as bearing rather a nautical than a military appearance, and as being thoroughly English in the hearty frankness of his manners. The American Chamber of Commerce at Liverpool presented an address of welcome to General Schenck, who, in reply, said that three rules had guided the action of the High Joint Commission—viz: to demand nothing which could not be conceded without loss of dignity and honor; to insist upon those points which involved principles, instead of caviling about forms and phraseology; and to bear in mind that a war between the two great English-speaking nations would be a crime alike against humanity and against civilization.—Court Journal.

— The Bankruptcy Disqualification bill, which has passed the House of Lords, disqualifies from sitting or voting in that House every peer who becomes a bankrupt, including any peer whose affairs are liquidated by arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act; as to Scotland, a deliverance awarding sequestration is to disqualify. The term "peer" is to include any lord of Parliament. The bill enacts that "a writ of summons shall not be issued to any peer" while thus disqualified. The disqualification is to cease on the bankruptcy being determined either by its being annulled or the bankrupt being discharged from his debts by payment or satisfaction, or in the modes prescribed by the statutes in force. The bill is to apply to any person already bankrupt, or to any person "who before or after the passing of this Act becomes bankrupt, and subsequently succeeds to a peerage," whose bankruptcy has not determined at the time of his so succeeding.

— In future no presentation can be made at a levee excepting by a person actually attending that levee. It is also necessary that intimation from the nobleman or gentleman who is to make the presentation of his intention to be present should accompany the presentation card above referred to, which will be submitted to the Queen for Her Majesty's approbation. It is Her Majesty's command that no presentations shall be made at the levee except in accordance with the above regulations. It is particularly requested that in every case the names be very distinctly written upon the cards to be delivered to the Lord Chamberlain, in order that there may be no difficulty in announcing them to his Royal Highness. The State apartments will be open for the reception of company coming to Court at one o'clock.

— An action raised by the present Earl of Perth and Melfort to recover from the trustees of the late Lady Willoughby d'Eresby the estates forfeited by the attainder of the Earl of Perth and Lord John Drummond after Culloden in 1746, is about to come before the House of Lords. The rental of the estates is about £30,000 a year. The titles and honors were forfeited along with the estates, but after various proceedings before the Committee of Privileges, these were regranted to the present Earl some years ago. The Court of Session, reversing the decision of the Lord Ordinary, decided against the Earl's claim to the estates on the preliminary question of "satisfying production"—hence the present appeal.

— Among the victims of petroleum in Paris is the well-known Nuto-Narini, the once famous hermit of Mount Vesuvius, who, having realized an easy fortune through the donations of his foreign visitors, cut his nails, shaved his beard, and throwing aside his cowl and cassock, set off for Paris, where, for the last ten years, he has led the jolliest life possible. He was one of the finest connoisseurs in wine ever known, and his attachment to his cellar, which he could not be persuaded to leave, was the cause of his death. The flames consumed his house at the corner of the Rue Royale, and he is supposed to have perished in the ruins.—London American Register.

— His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, with Prince John of Glucksburg and Prince Vladimir of Russia, went on board the Xantha, Lord A. Paget's steam yacht, before that fine yacht steamed away on her cruise to Dutch waters with her noble owner and the Earl of Yarborough on board.

— A French Marquis, who has published his voyages in Australasia, describes the ladies of Cape York as being "enveloped in the dazzling rays of a tropical sun-burn—and nothing else."

— An American orator proposes to "grasp a ray of light from the great orb of day, spin it into threads of gold, and with them weave a shroud in which to wrap the whirlwind which dies upon the bosom of our western prairies."

— Artemus Ward says: "Yu ma differ as much as you pleze about the style of a young lady's figger, but I tell yu confidenshally, if she has forty thousand pounds, the figger is about as near right as you will get it."

— Gen. Butler's style of speech-making and letter-writing is, according to the Boston Traveler, the "harum-scarum-helter-skelter, knock-down-and-drag-out, one-down-another-come-on, go-it-ye-cripples style."

The "Seasons."

The following lines, written for the News Letter, and sent all the way from New Hampshire, seem to be designed as a parody on the new poem of the same name by Wm. Morris:

"SPRING."

Mud am I, so "soft of heart,"
That I cling to every cart,
"And the summer's sun shall prove
The abundance of my love."

"SUMMER."

A mosquito-fly am I,
"Men shall pray or—ere I die,"
"Prithee take it not amiss,"
"Though I weary thee with bliss."

"AUTUMN."

Fall's blue-bottle, "here I stand"
On your nose, or book, or hand;
Billy Morris, let me be,
"Naught but rest seems good to me."

"WINTER."

Winter's coming cures this pack;
Leave Blue-bottle! seek a crack!
Shoo-fly, Skeeter! Here's Jack Frost.
"Neath the snow the mud is lost."

Houghton.

The Republican Congressional Convention of the First District assembled yesterday, at Mercantile Library Hall, in this city, and after organizing, Mr. Sears, of San Francisco, placed in nomination for Representative in Congress the name of Mr. Selby, the unsuccessful candidate for Governor before the State Convention at Sacramento. The nomination was seconded by Mr. Houghton, of Santa Clara, and unanimously carried. Of course, this was but a graceful compliment—a manner of letting Mr. Selby down easy. This was apparent to the contemplative outsider, from the fact that Messrs. Sears and Houghton were themselves candidates for the nomination. In accordance with the programme decided upon, Mr. Selby was duly surprised, and then thoughtfully declined. The Convention had adjourned until evening, to give him time to do it, when it again met, and Messrs. Sears, Houghton and McClellan were placed in nomination, with the usual and inevitable blather and bathos rostrum accompaniments. Mr. Houghton made a quiet, gentlemanly speech, and then the agony began. Mr. McClellan got upon his hind legs, and shook his side whiskers. He then overturned a few tottering European thrones, exterminated all the crumbling dynasties and effete despotisms extant, and with a joke too profound for the average comprehension, wriggled gracefully out of the fight and off the platform. Mr. Sears made a tolerably long harangue, and then the ballot: Houghton 81, Sears 39, and the country is saved. Seriously, the work was done in a business-like manner, and if it be not inconsistent with good morals—for the which we are a stickler—we trust it may bear fruit. In other words, we do not care a tinsmith's imprecation who goes to Congress. Our political position is one of energetic and active neutrality.

Calvinism.

Calvinism is not an amiable form of creed. It is absolutely repulsive to those minds which seek the soft atmosphere of mysticism, which hate to hear the jargon of law in the sanctuary of the Temple, and which covet a misty horizon for their faith. Nevertheless, Calvinism has done signal service to the Scottish people. It has made their sermons logical and intellectual. By forcing the clergy to preach discourses which mean something, it has forever divorced the pulpit from the consolations of twaddle, and has made the people a nation of thinkers. The Calvinistic theology, and the sermons which it shapes, have done more to quicken the intellect of Scotland than all her parish schools and universities.

National Sensitiveness.

The old theory used to be that people belonging to nations without a history are the most sensitive, that the exceptionally thick skin of the Englishman when attacked on account of national peculiarities was due to the nearly unbroken character of English political prosperity. As a matter of fact, however, Scotchmen, with their proud history in the distant past, and great prosperity in the immediate past, are exceptionally sensitive to attacks on their nationality; and so are the Spaniards, who, if they have fallen in the world, certainly do not know it; while the French before their disasters, with their marvelous history, were morbidly sensitive to criticism even from themselves, denouncing the latter as unpatriotic.

— Mr. Soap, a railroad man of this city, has invented a "switch." We know nothing as to the general utility of his device, but we know a great many children in town upon which both the invention and its inventor might be made extremely useful.

— It is stated that a portion of Buckingham Palace is about to be set apart as a town residence for the Princess Louisa and the Marquis of Lorn.

The New and Wonderfully Improved Version of the Holy Scriptures.

We protest against any change in the "authorized version" of the Holy Scriptures; we protest against the sophisms of the devil-dodgers of the present day; we declare in favor of preserving these curious records in the form we have received them—through the pious requirements of King James. The intelligent portion of mankind—in short, "the Ten"—understand right well what is meant. Leave them as they are; let not a set of old priests assembled in London, England, take on themselves to "polish them up;" we want no "new face" put upon them; not a bit of it! These charming old records of Sun Worship ought to be preserved, and all the persons thereof—for our grandchildren, who will doubtless understand the "hidden" or "spiritual" meaning, and "the interpretation thereof." It is not a new and improved version of the Holy Scriptures, "suited for schools" and the requirements of the moment, that we want; it is a Protestant Reformation, and the public acknowledgment of the absolute necessity of submitting every point to reason—the greatest gift of God to man. Have these pestilent priests started fair, with an acknowledgment that there is a spiritual or secret meaning concealed beneath an apparent one; that there is a difference between the "spirit" and the "Letter;" we believe not: it would be against the interest of the craft. The fact is perfectly certain that they are professional priests, prepared to support the devil-dodging trade in all its infamy; men who would burn Colenso at the stake, or "any other man" who dared to throw himself on common sense, nature, and Almighty God, whom with reverence he it spoken, despises all sects as much as we do:

Fashion.

Fashion always begins and ends in two things it abhors most—singularity and vulgarity. It is the perpetual setting up and then disowning a certain standard of taste, elegance and refinement, which has no other formation or authority than that it is the prevailing distraction of the moment, which was yesterday ridiculous from its being new, and to-morrow will be odious from its being common. It is one of the most slight and insignificant of all things. It cannot be lasting, for it depends on the constant change and shifting of its own harlequin disguises; it cannot be sterling, for if it were it could not depend on the breath of caprice. It must be superficial to produce its immediate effect on the gaping crowd, and frivolous to admit of its being assumed at pleasure by the number of those who appear to be in the fashion, to be distinguished from the rest of the world. It is not anything in itself, nor the sign of anything but the folly and vanity of those who rely upon it as their greatest pride. * * * Fashion is haughty, trifling, affected, servile, despotic, mean and ambitious, precise and fantastical, all in a breath—tied to no rule, and bound to conform to every rule of the minute.—Hazlitt.

— On last Tuesday evening the Knights of St. Crispin held a meeting to devise measures to resist the encroachment of the Chinese upon the trade. Naturally Mr. Sheehan presided, and Mr. Flaherty was conspicuously in attendance. As was to have been expected, some members counseled "more effective measures than mere speech-making"—a Crispinian euphemism for splitting asunder the Chinese head and dog-chewing the Chinese muscular tissue. Resolutions were passed "embodying the sense of the Order." It is fair to presume that they were sound—and fury signifying nothing. A thing so stupendously little as the sense of these leathery-headed pole-puggers might be "embodied" in a cypher. The meeting is an indication of trouble in store for the Johns, and we advise these to prepare to refute the arguments of their opponents by anointing their own shins with dog-poison, that the Crispinian ultima ratio may be covertly assailed in the stomach.

— In connection with a recent event at Sacramento, it becomes important to know how Mr. Selby stands upon the more vital questions affecting the welfare of this State. We are not in his confidence, but we feel authorized to state that he will labor faithfully to further the interests of lead pipe and the larger kinds of bird shot. His well known firmness and decision of character warrants the hope that he will wield an iron hand in the reduction of rebellious ores. Being himself addicted to "smelting," the fishing interest is safe in his hands. We think, upon the whole, that he may be trusted to faithfully perform the duties of the position to which he has been called. Mr. Selby has himself frankly and honestly stated his views upon the railroad subsidy question, and with such clearness and force that it is very unlikely they will ever be seriously refuted, or that there will be any further attempt to misrepresent his position. It would be cruel.

— The lady who wrote to the ex-Empress Eugenie, inviting her to come to the United States and lecture, is disgusted at not being favored with an answer.

Anacreontic.

O if my love offended me, And we had words together, To show her I would master be, I'd whip her with a feather. If then she, like a naughty girl, Would tyranny declare it, I'd give my love a cross of pearl, And make her always bear it. And if she dared her lips to pout, Like many pert young misses, I'd wind my arm her waist about, And punish her with kisses!	If still she tried to sulk and sigh, And threw away my posies, I'd catch my darling on the sly, And smother her with roses! But should she clench her dimpled fists, Or contradict her betters, I'd manacle her tiny wrists With dainty golden fetters! —J. Ashby-Sterry.

The Island of San Juan.

We briefly announced, on Sunday, the finding of an American map at the office of the Colonial Secretary of this Colony, which defines the boundary line between the United States and the British Possessions, and marks out with the distinctness of black dotted lines and green ink the islands claimed by the British and American Governments respectively. The map is the same as that alluded to by the Earl of Lauderdale, a few weeks ago, in the House of Lords, of which it was said few copies are now extant. All that the United States could get hold of have been called in and destroyed. In overhauling a lot of old papers at the Colonial Secretary's office on Saturday, the map was found. Its importance may be estimated when we state that the map is an authorized edition. The 49th parallel is distinctly and plainly marked out, as we have stated, and the line is drawn to the center of the Gulf of Georgia; thence southerly, passing between Lummi and Orcas Islands; thence to Sinclair Islands, where it passes Cypress and Guemes Islands to Smith or Blunt Island; thence down through the center of the Straits of Fuca to the ocean. This line gives the British more than they claim. It gives them, in addition to San Juan and other important islands, Smith or Blunt Island, on which the United States Government have erected and maintained a lighthouse, together with several other islands to which no claim has yet been preferred, but which we suppose it will now be found necessary to include in our demands.—Victoria Colonist, June 20th.

The Next Novelty.

A land and water velocipede is the next novelty with which we are to be favored. This promises to put in the shade the extraordinary adventures of Rob Roy (Mr. J. McGregor), who voyaged in his tight little canoe up the river Jordan, and in many other parts of the East. Mr. Jackson, of Caroline-street, Eaton-square, is constructing a velocipede which is to convey him direct from London to Paris without stopping, its peculiarity being that it is amphibious. The same wheels which are suitable for the road will act as paddles in the water, and appear to be as suitable for the one as for the other. The experiment has been tried with a temporary-constructed machine, and found to be practicable.

— We were honored the other day with a visit from Mr. At Lee, editor of the New Age, who came to explain the mystery of his Mongolian blood and Caucasian calling, over which we had vainly puzzled in private, and of which we finally took the liberty to publicly ask an explanation. We regret exceedingly that we were not in, and shall hope to claim the privilege of calling at our editorial brother's sanctum, and taking a cup of tea with him. His command of our language, as shown in his journal, is sufficient assurance that the services of an interpreter will be superfluous, and its general excellence and scholarly spirit claim our sincere admiration, and have induced a desire to personally know its editor.

— A correspondent writes: "TOWN CRIER.—What is the cause of your bald head; likewise the color of your goggle eyes?—and decide a bet." When we are angered the latter are pea-green. We are now angered.

— Put six-penny-worth of clean and fresh hops in your pillow-case, and you must be ill, or sorely conscience-stricken, if you do not sleep, or find a soothing inclination thereto, gently stealing over the senses.

"Paris is Dead! Long Live Paris!"

We need never doubt that "hope springs eternal in the human breast," when we look at France. The people and journals of Paris, amid death and ruin (in the calm that now succeeds the hurricane) are full of the future, and are rapidly recovering from their depression, too rapidly, it may appear to us, even for decency; but not the less a noticeable fact. "We hope to be forgiven," says Le Temps, "for seeking in the very excess of our misfortunes, and even in the ashes of our dear and beautiful Paris, the hope of some future national resurrection." "Is it out of place," it goes on to ask, "in this supreme crisis of our existence as a society, to inquire whether the crisis may not become an opportunity for our salvation?" And it concludes that France will have exchanged artificial prosperity for real and solid prosperity, if her misfortunes serve to bring her back at last to the condition of free nations. La Liberté, too, taking the title of our present article as its text, reads a most remarkable sermon to the people of Paris. "Paris," it says, "is dead!" It is the end of a world, the end of a civilization! It is the end of a world and of a civilization which have been powerless against the German invasion, powerless against the insurrection! It is the end of an egotistic world, of a corrupting civilization! * * * It is the end of a world which placed the highest object of its activity and life in material enjoyment; it is the end of a civilization which could only satisfy the grosser appetites. * * * It is the end of the disgraceful part played by Paris in the world; Paris, which assumed the lofty name of capital of civilized nations, and which was only their brothel, their vast school of immorality." And then it turns to "Long Live Paris!" "A new era is beginning." Our ruin can no longer be the rendezvous of the carnival of Europe. "We shall have to toil hard in order to extract from our fallow fields, from our ruined manufactures and our wasted commerce, the milliards due to Prussia and the money for the restoration of our ruined capital. But labor purifies the mind and strengthens the body; and God grant that we may not restore our monuments till we have reformed our morals!" It matters not that La Liberté turns all this to account in favor of a Republic. The world will read it as an acknowledgment of the true secret of the fall of Paris. If it be anything more than pretty sentiment, and if it be the admission of the nation as well as the expression of a journalist, it may mean a new existence for France. It has been said that the shadow on the dial, which marks the progress of civilization, went back last week. It will be for Paris to make amends for the past, to set about a moral as well as a political revolution, and she may with great propriety endeavor to find out what part the license of Romanism and the selfishness of Atheism have played in the past troubles.

Obituary.

Young tells us in his "Night Thoughts" that death is the crown of life, and but for death the poor would live in vain. But it would seem that those we love die too soon. On Monday last was buried from St. Francis' Church, in this city, a lady beloved by all who knew her, possessing youth, beauty, and accomplishments of no mean order. Mrs. Josephine Viadero was an ornament to the society in which she moved, and in which her death leaves a void not soon to be filled.

"And thou art dead, as young and fair
As aught of mortal birth;
And form so soft, and charms so rare,
Too soon return'd to earth!
Though earth received them in her bed,
And o'er the spot the crowd may tread,
In carelessness or mirth,
There is an eye which could not brook
A moment on that grave to look."

— Theodore Glynn has been fined five dollars for using profane language. Theodore may as well understand at once that he can't imprecate with impunity in a city of civil and religious liberty, especially if the same be burdened with a heavy municipal debt which can be paid only by a tax upon blaspheming. Theodore urges that the debt was contracted chiefly by plunder and general dishonesty. Well, two wrongs do not make a right, but one wickedness may be advantageously taxed to pay for another. For example, the vice of intemperance is very properly made to contribute to the extinction of a national debt caused by the expense of cutting throats. It is true that it is not quite so wicked to drink whisky as it is to cut a throat, and swearing is one degree less vile than plundering; but then it must at least be admitted that the sum of the angles of a triangle is equal to two right angles, and that if all A is B, and C is A, then you cannot make a tin whistle out of a pig's tail, which is absurd. [At this point the Town Crier became so deeply metaphysical that he could not preserve a proper distinction between his morality and his geometry, and having seen his logic expire ingloriously in the spiral agony of a pig's tail, he had recourse to pure theology, and his subject became at once as intelligible as the second spasm of Goethe's Faust, and as instructive as the repentant reverie of a boa constrictor distended to a particular thinness over the passive anatomy of a cast-iron dog.

Our European Reflex.

The Orleans star is in the ascendant. The princes of that house allow themselves to be talked about—nay, go so far as to permit it to be hinted that they were present at the review of the Longchamps. That same review was a perilous experiment. It was the touchstone of the fidelity of the army. Two elements of danger existed in thus culling together a hundred thousand soldiers; the one was the old watchword, the still slumbering magnetism of the name of Napoleon, the other was that later and more disaffecting spirit of Communism. For the very essence of Communism is antagonistic to the fact of a standing army, and that doctrine is so subtle that when it once gets into the ranks it spreads and ramifies until the whole corps is inclosed in its meshes. Did the elephant but know his strength how powerless were man to guide him. So is it with the masses. They have not yet tasted of the tree of knowledge, the first fruits of which are intemperance and crime. Communism changed Versailles from a republic to a despotism. Versailles has changed Communism into a monarchy, and they who would have cried vive la charte, now cry vive la duc de Chambord. Had Versailles been conciliatory Paris had not become ferocious. Had Versailles been initiatoryly decisive, the Commune would not have been able to achieve their work of destruction. Thus terrified menace on the one side led to aggressive crime on the other; again the weak hand could not snatch away the brand from the burning city. And now, when the Commune is crushed, the slaughter begins, the excuse being that they (the Communists) were pervaded with the spirit of wanton destruction; so the victors act upon the homeopathic doctrine of similia similibus curantur, and like the Israelites of old, smite the Parisians hip and thigh. We can hardly believe that the Courts Martial have sentenced Cramieux and Pellissier to death, and Duclos and others to transportation. If such is the case this severity will rebound on the judges. Gambetta hangs on the outskirts of France, either on the Spanish border or at a seaport, keeping his one eye wide open. The Emperor of Germany has proffered a needless pardon to political or military prisoners in Alsace or Lorraine, that is to say, he pardons crimes committed against a government not his own, and therefore, which he can neither sentence upon nor punish. In Austria a drama of the coolest nature is going on. The German complications have brought the Hungarian deputies to the fore in the Parliament and even Poland raises her head; such being the case, Count Von Hohenwart, the Prime Minister, never admits an adverse vote as a defeat, complacently urging as a reason that having been intrusted by his Imperial Master to form a government and frame amendments to the constitution, he feels it his duty to do so, even contrary to the expressed disapproval of the House. The Minister gains ground daily; eventually the German party will be outvoted, and Austria will assume the prouder position of ruling Hungary and the Slave provinces by affection, and not through Germany. A ministerial crisis at Madrid. The Minister desirous of resigning; entreated to remain, more from doubt as to who should be his successor than for any other reason. The Tory party in England, true to its traditions, opposes the terms of the conference just terminated at Washington; denounces it as a cession without an equivalent, and a yielding without a struggle. We have not received the details of the reply made by Lord Granville, but only know that the Tory resolutions were rejected without a division. To make the terms of the convention binding, they must be such as should be alike honorable and agreeable to both parties, and not concluded without mature and crucial mutual observation. The French nation has an extraordinary predilection for lending itself money. No sooner is a Government loan announced, it matters not whether it be by a Republic, a Bonaparte, or a provisional committee, forthwith out come the earnings, and more is offered than is asked for. It is a type of the French nationality and of self-reliance, amounting almost to vanity. In direct contrast with this was the action of the United States during and after her war. The French Government asked for two milliards, and immediately five milliards are eagerly subscribed. France springs up more like one refreshed by sleep, than an athlete exhausted with a strife which the world deemed mortal. It was the action of German bankers buying up U. S. bonds that caused their gradual rise and hastened the present advanced rate of American securities in the markets of the world. The visit of the Emperor and Empress of Brazil to England looks like a gathering of the whole Orleans family, and the rumored interview of the Duke de Chartres and Comte de Paris with Thiers lends weight to the feeling of an intended movement to restore the ancient dynasty. Meanwhile, the agents of Napoleon are busily engaged, and by speciously framed pamphlets addressed to the people, together with many promises to Holy Church, hope to make a diversion in favor of the exiled Emperor.

One Dunn will accept our intimation that he is an ass of extraordinary auricular development and astounding resonance of larynx.

The Amador Strike.

Much balderdash has been written concerning the emeute of the miners of Amador county, and the usual spirit of ridicule which pervades the American mind in dealing with this, as with every subject of its consideration, has been manifested. We are not disposed to satirize, nor, on the other hand, to give undue importance to the events of the past week. We do not underrate the rights of labor, nor the privileges of capital, nor the responsibility of those whose duty it is to protect and foster the leading interest, commercially speaking, of the State of California. Certainly the laborer has the right to say at what wages he will work. Certainly he has the right to combine with his fellows in every lawful way to produce for himself the best results and the highest reward: and to this extent he is entitled to sympathy and countenance. Beyond this he has no privilege. The liberty he demands for himself he must allow to others. If Pat McGinniss and Patsey Boliver don't choose to extract ores for less than three dollars per diem, why, let them remain idle. If Tom Noakes and John Stokes are ready and willing to expend their muscular energies in honest labor for two dollars and a half per diem, why, let them do so. If the employer, mine-owner or capitalist does not see his interest in utilizing his property on the terms proposed by either of these gentlemen, why, let him remain in peaceful possession of his own and do what he will with it. The Amador League, as we understand it, not merely fixes its own rate of compensation, but assumes to say that no man shall toil, however willing and anxious he may be to secure employment, for any other price than it decrees. It enforced this declaration by driving away from the mines, by intimidation or acts of cruel and brutal force, all contented workmen. It drew the fires from the furnaces, stopped the pumps from keeping the mines clear of water, and left them to decay and certain ruin. The arrogant lawlessness and insolence of this action of the League aroused the mine owners to a determined resistance, and resulted in an appeal to the State authorities for protection. Property valued at millions was in actual peril, and millions more not yet subject to the dominion of an organized mob, were waiting attack in other parts of the State, according as the Amador League succeeded or failed. For the credit of the Governor be it said, that notwithstanding the pressure of Labor Organizations and the solicitations of politicians who valued votes more than justice, he acted promptly, and, in the end, wisely. A sufficient number of State troops was ordered out, and put in readiness for descent on the turbulent Communists. The Governor proceeded in person to attempt to bring them to reason. But, what reason did not put into their thick skulls, reason failed to get out, and the Governor speedily discovered that nothing less than the presence of armed force would restore order and maintain the laws of the land. The troops were sent forward, and with them went security for property and the right of each individual man to work for honest wages without molestation or abuse. They will remain at their post, we fervently hope, until the last vestige of mobocracy is starved out, or, if need be, driven out of the State at the point of the bayonet. The authorities and the State forces engaged in the work have our heartiest sympathies for their just, temperate and prudent action. The men of Our National Guard, too, have shown that they have higher qualities than those which grace picnics and flourish on the 4th of July behind a sheet iron band of music. They responded promptly to the call of the Governor, abandoned pleasant occupations and lucrative employments, and are doing just what was to have been expected from law-abiding citizens and good soldiers. It is a pity to see certain of the baser sort of the city press busy in vilifying and caricaturing them, and flinging each its petty handful of filth upon them, simply because, being part of the necessary machinery of Government, they cheerfully do what is required of them, and are at last putting to practical use their drill and military training. The public need not be told that the New York Letter has no higher joy than to prick pretentious bladders or create a laugh at the expense of suitable subjects. But in this business we see only a lamentable attempt to destroy or seriously impair a great industry of this young State by most unjustifiable means, promptly and efficiently repressed by lawful authority temperately used.

The Sacramento "Union."

In the editorial conduct of a newspaper, the most opposite policies will often lead to an identical success. You may study to keep abreast of, or ever so slightly behind or ahead of, popular opinion, like the New York Herald; or you may ignore and wholly disregard popular opinion, like the News Letter—and in either case your success will be assured, if only you have pursued your chosen course intelligently and consistently. For the first you will require sagacity of no common order; for the second is needed a quality which modesty forbids us to more particularly point out. We may remark, however, that if you do not treat the public to its own views, you must give it something unmistakably better. There are in fact a dozen roads to success, and it seems a trifle strange that from among them so few men are able to select at all. It is not our present purpose to assist our bone-headed contemporaries by pointing them to a prosperity that would be materially damaging to our own; our reflections were merely suggested by thinking hard at the Sacramento Union, which has just made a Republican candidate for Governor of this State, and stands a fair chance of electing him. This is strictly true, and every competing journal, if honest, would admit it. Not only did the Union put Mr. Booth in nomination, but it did this in pursuance of a policy of its own, dictated, in part, by revenge upon the most powerful moneyed monopoly of all the West. The anti-railroad subsidy movement not only originated with that journal, but it was by it forced upon the Republican party, and, from the necessity of self-protection, upon the Democratic party also. In shaping public policy by dictating public opinion, the Sacramento Union is a power infinitely greater than all the balance of the press combined. For all the years the writer of this article has been in California, he has quietly enjoyed the not very quiet spectacle of a perennial combat between the Union upon one side and the entire California press upon the other. When a journal can maintain such a position as this, it is a trifling matter whether it comes out of each particular discussion with triumph or defeat; its end is attained in the hostility it has provoked, and, like Antæus, it rises mightier from each fall. And, sooth to say, the Union is as frequently worsted as triumphant in debate. Now how is this done? Simply by harping on a single string. It picks up a subject like a bull pup worrying a rat. It shakes it and lays it down; picks it up and shakes it again; walks round and lays hold of it again; tosses, crunches and goes away that it may return to toss and crunch. Whether its victim is a real or a fancied rat is of little consequence; the shaking goes on like Tennyson's "Brook"—forever. But before it has gone on long, the Union has drawn upon itself, first the ridicule, then the grave and labored expostulations, then the angry protest, and finally the chagrined abuse of all its contemporaries, who seem profoundly unaware of the sordid advertising uses to which they are being put—blindly ignorant that ridicule, expostulation, protest and abuse are the aim and object of the whole proceeding. The "gentleman from the Interior" points his moral and adorns his tale with copious extracts from the Union, which is his oracle. The gentleman from the Interior happens to believe in the power of the Union, and by so doing (for he is a numerous voter) he confers the thing in which he believes. We are not ourselves particularly friendly to the journal in question, and esteem its opinions as we esteem most other opinions—infinately inferior to our own; and its general course we regard as intelligent only in a commercial sense, and honest in no sense whatever. But the phenomena we have noted have long impressed us as most remarkable, and therefore a proper subject of remark. Not being included in the great game of the Sacramento Union vs. the California Press, we are in a position to impartially fulfill the duties of marker. The score looks bad for the Press.

— We learn from an exchange that a grandson of the famous Daniel O'Connell is editing a newspaper in New York. The family seems to have a journalistic turn. The father of the race is in San Francisco, where may be seen the good-natured gleam of the old gentleman's spectacles, searching the columns of the Bulletin with a thoughtful radiance, and emitting a twinkle of quiet approval as the "Oakland Items" advance into the focus and beam back with a kindred brilliancy.

— Captain Hall has taken with him to the Arctic regions—or will take it with him, if he has not yet defrauded the life insurance companies by sailing—a thermometer capable of registering eighty-eight degrees below zero. It will be a cheerful diversion for Captain Hall to stand and hold that thermometer and watch the mercury get down as low as it can, and then take off his coat and wrap it up warm to make it go up again for a new observation.

— One Phister has been assessed fifty dollars for drawing a pistol upon a contumacious female tenant. The sentence was a tolerably unrighteous one; the fact that he thought better of it and did not shoot proves that he was a coward—therefore that his mind was in a natural human condition—therefore unsound.

— A pleasant manner which is frequently neglected as a small thing, is often that which decides men for or against us.

The Tuolumne Trio.

"A friend till all hell froze over,
And then three days on the ice;
A bell-ringer, too, at a rifle shot,
And a beggar at throwin' the dice."

So Busted Ben informed me,
As we hatched near the tavern fire;
There wasn't a man in Pumpkin Knob
Would dare to call Ben a liar.

Ben was only a blurred press-copy
Of what he had been in his youth,
But like all those soft reminders,
He never spoke aught but truth.

Knowned Bony! Should think so, sar'tain,
As well as I know my hoss; [ground,
Why, Algerine Camp was our stampin'
Me and Bony and Towheaded Ross.

Why, Bony, he shot seven greasers,
As lofed round Tuolumne Bar,
And done for two Deppity Sheriffs,
As was huntin' me somewhar thar.

He was a lightnin' striker,
As allers was born to be boss;
'Twas jest a spike-team and a buster,
Me and Bony and Towheaded Ross.

If I misene, when we've landed,
And parsons are there and sich like,
Why, we'll jest make our game three-handed,
Me and Towhead and Bony Vandyke.

Antioch, Cal., June 22, 1871.

Why, he was the law-and-order-est man
As ever straddled a mule;
And he druv them Vigilantes
Like a bumblebee scatters a school.

But jest because them fellers
Was a huntin' Towhead down,
Fur knifin' a man what had stole his hoss,
Bony kept them outer the town.

Them two was slew together,
And I—d'ye see that scar?—
Was plowed in the neck with a rifle ball,
Like a rip from the claw of a bar.

That parson from outer Sonora,
He said as they got their deserts,
I hope the Devil's a cookin' him now,
And bustin' with red hot squirts.

Them parson chaps is holy—
And so is a cane-seat cheer;
They allers calls 'em a missionary—
They hain't any mission here.

Fur I don't believe God is a feller
To jedge a man by his close,
Nor when he walks inter his garding,
Snubs a daisy and pulls every rose.

—G. F. E.

— We have received the following dispatch from the seat of war in Amador, where the pretty soldiers have gone under command of a staff officer to suppress the striking miners. The dispatch is secret, and therefore authentic: "All stagnant on Sutter Creek. Military hopeful—Miners' League correspondingly confident. The League is elated at the splendid equipment of the army. Hostilities will begin as soon as both sides are ready. (The wicked are requested to abstain from food and drink until both sides are ready.) Each embattled host is busy securing its line of retreat in case it should meet with organized resistance. The Honest Miner swears to demolish the dishonest Major. From yonder Sierras forty centuries look down upon the soldiers! A council of war was held by the military chiefs, and it was decided not to eat the dead of the enemy, but to worry along on half rations of their own sick. During the session of the council there was thunder, an earthquake threw up a small white mouse of mountain parentage, the sun stood still upon one leg, and the constellation Taurus licked his wide nostrils alternately, with a contemplative regularity and a uniform curl of the tongue that boded no good to anybody. Canis Major descended from the firmament, sat down in front of the tent, humped up his back, stuck out his hinder legs stiffly in front and dragged himself toward the enemy as if he too had an itching for fame. In the most tremendous moment of this solemn conference the lights winked mysteriously, a beer bottle popped without human agency, and a green rat leaped upon the table and executed an astonishing tour de force by spinning rigidly upon the point of his tail. Here the despatch became unintelligible, as if a battle were expected. The colored troops fought nobly.

— William Nandrupe has had to pay a fine of two hundred dollars for walloping his wife. After paying it, he returned to his humble hearth and seated himself moodily thereon. Observing his abstracted and melancholy demeanor, the good wife approached and tenderly inquired the cause. "It's a delicate subject, dear," said he, with love-light in his eyes; "let's talk about something good to eat." Then, with true wifely instinct, she sought to cheer him up with pleasing prattle of a new bonnet he had promised her. "Ah! darling," he sighed, absently picking up the fire-poker and turning it in his hands, "let us change the subject." Then his soul's idol chirped an inspiring ballad, kissed him on top of the head, and sweetly mentioned that the dress-maker had sent in her bill. "Let us talk only of love," returned he, rolling up his dexter sleeve. And so she spake of the vine-embowered cottage in which she fondly hoped they might soon sip together the conjugal sweets. William became rigidly vertical, a look not of earth was in his face, his breast heaved and the fire-poker quivered with emotion. William felt deeply. "Mine own," said the good woman, now busily irrigating a mass of snowy dough for the evening meal, "do you know that there is not a bite of meat in the house?" It is a cold, unlovely truth—a sad, heart-sickening fact—but it must be told by the conscientious journalist: William repaid all this affectionate solicitude—all this womanly devotion—all this trust, and confidence, abnegation, in a manner that needs not be particularly specified. A short, sharp curve in the middle of that iron fire-poker is eloquent of a wrong redressed.

Electioneering Bribery.

An English Attorney remarks that nothing is easier to carry out than bribery, a common prudence be only observed. He tells of a case in which he was professionally employed to supply sub rosa $10,000 to an important electioneering agent. He was desired to be looking in at a print-shop window in the Strand precisely at twelve o'clock, when a party behind would tap him on the shoulder, and repeat a line of Shakspeare; that at five minutes past twelve he would receive another tap, and have a second line from the same illustrious author repeated in his ear; that a further interval of five minutes would ensue—his watch to be consulted—when the immortal Shakspeare, already made a particeps criminis, was again to be a subsidiary—"to what vile uses do we come at last"—and a third line from his divine page administered with the indispensable tap on the shoulder. "Then to some foul corrupting hand, their craving lusts with fatal bounty fed, they fall a willing, undefended prize." After this, the learned gentleman handed from his pocket to his poetical but mythical friend behind, a packet containing the bank-notes. When the disputed election came to be investigated before a Parliamentary committee, he was able to swear that the person produced was one whom he had never seen in his life.

Woman's Work.

The Saturday Review says: We must remember that women cannot abolish their duties; they can only delegate them—turn them down from hand to hand till they reach the lowest, which perhaps will refuse them in its turn, and so throw them back to the starting point, where they ought to be. Thus all the cry raised now for a wider sphere means only, in the case of married women, that they do not like their natural duties, and that they want to shuffle off to other shoulders the assigned burdens which they do not choose to carry on their own. They do not propose that men should keep the house, or that machines should nurse the baby; they only ask that other women than themselves should do so; and they confess, with cynical frankness, that they prefer to engross parchment and make up pills for money wherewith to pay other women for their time, rather than themselves nurse or educate their own children, or put thought, energy, or knowledge into making the home happy and beautiful for husband and family.

— It is said that no less than seventeen decorations await Dr. Livingstone upon his arrival in Europe. It is to be hoped he may not hear of it, or he won't come. He has been long enough among the black savages of Central Africa to become disgusted with "decorations," one would think. In a place where the royal favor is expressed by sewing up the navel with wire, and appending thereto the skull of a young alligator (vide Speeke), and nobility is conferred by fastening upon the candidate the tail of a cow, one would naturally get to think lightly of such honors. Dr. Livingstone might be given a grand complimentary benefit at one of the London theaters; or he might have a speech made at him by the Lord Mayor; or a bay stallion might be named in his honor—or a cravat. So eminent a scientist should be rewarded in some delicate and characteristic way, but if we were a "crowned head," instead of wooden-head, we should hesitate before offering him a bauble to stick on the lapel of his coat. It would be in a little better taste for these generous patrons to ask the favor of a decoration from him.

— Those social philosophers who have all along asserted that the late European war was an unqualified benefit to America, may now be easily covered with confusion and brought to the confessional: the German young men having been thinned out, the girls are coming over here like a swarm of devouring locusts, to get husbands. We exalt our warning voice to our friend the Marriageable Man: the she German—or perhaps we should say the Gerwoman—is not a desirable wife. She "eats awful," and is profoundly prolific.

— Prince Bismarck is reported, on the authority of an American diplomatist, to have said: "The civil war at Paris frightens me neither for Europe nor for France. Let the Commune go on, and all the revolutionists of the world will make their rendezvous there. When the Assembly will be complete the trap will be shut, and very fortunate will be those who escape."

— In his speech at New York, Earl de Grey called George Washington "one of the most illustrious of Englishmen." In comparison with this, the heart of an iceberg is uncomfortably warm, and the claim of an Ethiopian Baronet to a seat in the United States Senate would be an example of modest humility.

— An anti-kissing society has been formed by the Galena, Ill., girls. "No kissing before marriage," is their motto.

The Alabama Claims Payers.

British people, do not cry
O'er your mess of humble pie,
Treaty, not to call it names,
Touching Alabama Claims.
Eat it up, be not afraid,
Never mind of what 'tis made;
You won't taste it, you'll digest,
'Twill not weigh upon your breast.

Do not give its price a thought,
It will cost the Many nought.
All the sum awarded due,
Will be levied on the Few.
They alone that fine will share
Who the tax on income bear;
They're all extras doomed to pay
Evermore. Hip, hip, hooray!

— A remarkable instance of canine sagacity has just come to our notice. A gentleman living on Howard street had a small child, no wife, a large dog and a house. As he was unable to afford the expense of a nurse, he was accustomed to leave the child in the care of the dog, who was much attached to it, while absent at a distant restaurant for his meals, taking the precaution to lock them up together to prevent kidnapping. The other day, while at his dinner, he crowded a large, hard-boiled potato down his neck, and it worked him off into eternity. His clay was taken to the Coroner's, and the great word went on, marrying and giving in marriage, lying, cheating and praying, as if he had never existed. Meantime the dog had, after several days of neglect, forced an egress through a window, and a neighboring baker received a call from him daily. Walking gravely in, he would deposit a piece of silver, and receiving a roll and his change would march off homeward. As this was a rather unusual proceeding in a cur of his species, the baker one day followed him, and as the dog leaped joyously into the window of the deserted house, the man of dough approached and looked in. What was his surprise to see the dog deposit his bread calmly upon the floor and fall to tenderly licking the face of a beautiful child! It is but fair to explain that there was nothing but the face remaining. But what wonderful sagacity in a dog, to temper his diet of baby with a relish of bread! What a cultivated tooth! We would give anything for a dog like that—if we had a baby.

— Persons desiring to visit Magdalena Bay to gather orchilla for the Lower California Company will naturally desire some information as to their duties. Orchilla is an endless moss, which grows in the sea, and the stem is cut up into macaroni. In gathering it you use a reel, upon which you quietly wind some thousands of miles, until you come to a place where some other fellow has cut it. This reel is fastened at the side of a golden throne, upon which you sit, and it has a music box attached, that plays the most ravishing melodies. While operating it, you are served with wines, cigars, and all tropical delicacies, by beautiful female slaves. Each throne has a superb canopy of cloth-of-gold, supported upon pillars of topaz, and sparkling with all known gems and brilliants. The whole establishment—together with a palace, a park and stables crowded with winged horses—is decided to you directly you disembark at the Company's wharf. You are allowed all the money you want to send home; for where every desire is gratified the moment it is felt, there is, of course, no use for money. The climate is unspeakable, the winds being perfumed with attar of roses, and the sunlight falling through a sky of stained glass, across which float clouds of surpassing splendor. The whole country is covered with a natural Axminster carpet, except where holes have been cut to let the trees grow through. A great deal might be said upon this subject that would hardly be believed; but we hold him in light esteem who requires urging to make him go gather orchilla.

— J. W. Davidson & Co., of the "White House," announce that they will give away goods to everybody except the Town Crier. Now, he appeals to the public if this be not a most unjust and outrageous discrimination! After basely deserting him in his holy crusade against the Dry Goods Clerks' Early Closing Association, the least they could in decency have done would have been to give him two or three back-loads of ladies' hose or an armful of children's underwear. If they could but see his wan and pinched face, his hollow, sepulchral look, his wasted figure, and his attitude of general dejection and discouragement, they would be smitten with pity and consumed with remorse. What has the Town Crier done that he should thus be singled out for this active and bitter persecution? Before high heaven, he swears, with lifted hands, that he remembers committing no crime more atrocious than the murder of his mother, the maiming of an occasional babe with a cart-rung, the disemboweling here and there of a useless old man, and, at long intervals, the stealing of a soft corpse to feed to his needy swine. He flatters himself that in point of general morality he is no worse than he should be, considering that he is always consistently hungry, and seldom knows clearly where he is when he wakes up in the morning.

The Quartz Mines of Placer County.

The Grass Valley Union of the 24th inst. says: As the quartz mines around Auburn, Placer county, are attracting much attention, and as they are sure to attract still more attention from capitalists of this country as well as of Europe, we deem it proper to give a sketch of the mining industry of our neighboring county. We make our statements from careful personal observation and inspection, and we made the inspection because we wished to prove the proposition that mining in California, so far from being in a decline, is but commencing. The Auburn district is the most notable instance and witness in favor of our favorite proposition. A review of the mines there will show why labor, energy and capital seek the Auburn district as a field for mining operations.

SAINT PATRICK MINE.

Is located about three miles almost due west from Auburn. This mine is the best developed one in the district, and is so far one of the most successful mines in the State. The total depth of the shaft is 220 feet. From this shaft three levels have been run. The first level is at the depth of 80 feet, and has been run in toward the west, a distance of 20 feet. In this level the ledge is two and a half feet thick. The second level has been opened at the depth of 125 feet. The second level has been run in to the east the distance of 33 feet, and in this level the ledge is two and a half feet thick. The second level has been run to the west 22 feet, and in it the ledge is two feet thick. The third level is at the depth of 200 feet, and has been driven to the east the distance of 100 feet and has a vein two and a half feet thick; and to the west a distance of 20 feet, with a vein two and a half feet thick. The shaft is down 20 feet below the third level, and in the bottom of the shaft the ledge is four feet thick. The mineral bearing qualities of the ledge may be inferred from the fact that out of the excavations and openings we have described, gold to the value of over $50,000 has been excavated. "The ore in sight" may be calculated in this manner:

Depth of shaft.....	220 feet
Lower level opened.....	140 feet

These numbers multiplied give 30,800; and that multiplied by 2 feet, which is the average thickness of the ledge, gives 61,600 cubic feet of ledge developed. Dividing this by 14, the number of cubic feet in a ton of quartz, we have 4,400 tons in sight. On the dump there are 200 tons of ore. This gives a total of 4,600 tons in sight. For convenience, and because of the upper and shorter levels having been run, we throw off 100 tons, and call the total of ore in sight, at least 1,500. The last crushing of average ores yielded nearly $30 per ton. The next crushing, as good judges of ore inform us, and as we believe, will pay over $100 to the ton. The openings in the mine show a ledge which is remarkably uniform in its mineral-bearing qualities. The value of the ore in sight, at that rate, will be $450,000, or 50 per cent. more than the price of the whole property at the market value of the stock. In every instance the richness of the ore increases with the depth, and the St. Patrick mine, so far, is no exception to the rule. The St. Patrick ledge descends almost perpendicularly for 180 feet, and then takes an angle of about 45 degrees, pitching south. The ledge is inclosed in hard and smooth walls, and has not yet shown a fault. Two gentlemen of this place, familiar with mines, and who have worked in the Eureka and Idaho mines of Grass Valley, visited the St. Patrick mine with us, and they pronounce the latter a true ledge, and one of extraordinary richness. In addition to the St. Patrick ledge, the company own two other ledges, called the "Big Doig" and the "Little Doig," so named from the locator of them. The Little Doig runs nearly east and west parallel to the St. Patrick. The Big Doig runs from northeast to southwest, crossing the St. Patrick and Little Doig ledges diagonally. Both of the Doig ledges have been very rich on the croppings, when formerly worked, the Big Doig especially being rich. It is said, on good authority, that James Doig, the locator, took out $40,000 from the croppings of the two ledges which bear his name. The permanent working shaft of the ledge, or ledges, will be near the junction of the Big Doig with the St. Patrick. The croppings of all the ledges can be traced, on the surface, for a long distance—say more than a mile. The success of the St. Patrick in the past, and its great prospects for the future, have done much to make Auburn district a mining one.

SHIPLEY MINE.

Is located about six miles west from Auburn, on Shipley Ravine. The company have commenced work in earnest, and in a systematic manner. The permanent shaft, of a size of 15 by 5 feet, is being put down on the ledge, and is now at a depth of about 60 feet. The ledge is a very large one, being from 5 to 6 feet in thickness, and standing almost perpendicularly. North of this permanent shaft, and distant from it about 75 feet, is a small shaft down 104 feet. The ledge in this deeper shaft is looking very well, or as a mining friend of ours remarked, "she sits like a duck upon the water." North of the main shaft, and distant about 1,000 feet, is an immense outcrop of quartz standing about 15 feet above the surface of the ground at the highest and being about ten feet thick and 75 feet long. This outcrop is mostiferous to a paying degree, and on one of the highest points of it free gold can be seen. The Shipley Company have a ten-stamp mill run by water power. The wheel of this mill is 40 feet in diameter and is capable of driving 20 stamps. The ten stamps now used will crush 20 tons of quartz for every 24 hours. The power costs the company about $3 per day. Ore from the Shipley mine can be mined and milled at about $1 per ton, while the croppings yield by mill process from $10 to $12 per ton.

SAINT LOUIS MINE

Is located about a quarter of a mile west from the Shipley mine. The vein runs nearly north and south, and is enclosed in feldspathic granite. The vein is of the average of two feet in thickness. The company are running in a tunnel on the face of the ledge, and this tunnel is now in about 100 feet. When the tunnel is completed to the point designed, backs of 120 feet will be opened. The quartz of the St. Louis is of the laminated or ribbon kind. The rock shows fine free gold and occasionally rich specimens of rock bearing free gold are found. This mine is just being developed. The sulphurets assay well, and a ton of them shows, by assay, $150 in silver and $150 in gold. The sulphurets are argentiferous gray copper ore with iron pyrites with the gold.

BUCKEYE MINE

Is located east of the St. Patrick mine. The vein is an east and west one. It is enclosed in talcose slate. There are two shafts sunk on this ledge, and the shafts are 144 feet apart. The company are now running drifts to connect these two shafts. The drift is in 65 feet, running to the east. There are three stopes; the first stope is one of 54 feet, the second 34 feet, and the third is 14 feet. West of the west shaft a drift is in 15 feet, and east of the east shaft a drift is in 40 feet. Along the surface of the ledge, in former times, miners have stoped out 400 or 500 feet to a depth of 32 feet. The character of the ore is similar to the St. Patrick. The ledge is about 15 inches in thickness. The ore has paid, by mill process, $25 to $35 per ton, which gives large profits. Occasionally fine specimen rock is taken out, as in the St. Patrick.

GREEN MINE

Is well known to all who are interested in mines. It has been wonderfully rich, and is now in the same condition. The lowest depth attained in the Green is 125 feet. Of late rock has been taken from a level at 65 feet in depth. From this level, within the last thirty days, gold to the value of over $40,000 has been taken.

COX &amp; DENTON

Mine is one and a half miles northwest of Auburn. Work looking to permanency is being done at this mine. A shaft is being put down on the ledge, and a tunnel on the surface of the ledge is being driven. The shaft and the tunnel will connect at a depth of over 100 feet for the shaft and a length of 300 feet for the tunnel. The company have constructed a fine road from the Auburn Ravine Turnpike to the mine. The Cox & Denton mine have caused buildings to spring up, like Jonah's gourd, in a night, and unlike Jonah's gourd, they will not wither in a night. The rock from this mine looks well in sulphurets, and tests made from the croppings years ago, by mill process, prove that the ledge is a paying one. The ledge is well defined, and as far as developed shows an average of three and a half feet in thickness. San Francisco and Auburn men own this mine.

OTHER LEDGES.

Work is being actively prosecuted on the Mina Rica, Cæsus, Butcher Boy, Spring and Merrow, Putnam and other ledges. We noticed that Bob Cryer & Co's ledge is idle, though paying rock has been taken from it. A visitor to Auburn will soon discover, by specimens of gold bearing rock exhibited, and by talk about mining, that the district is alive to the principal interest of California.

FORMATION.

The country rock in the Auburn district is very much like that of Grass Valley. This insures permanency for the ledges, and the ledges show for themselves in metalliferous character.

California Pacific Railroad Eastern Extension.

On the 23d inst., the certificate of the incorporation of the "California Pacific Railroad Eastern Extension Company" was filed in the office of the Secretary of State, at Sacramento. As no synopsis of the articles could convey a satisfactory idea of this undertaking, by far the greatest and most important since the organization of the Central Pacific Company, we publish the certificate in full:

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS: That we, whose names are hereunto subscribed, being the subscribers to the stock of a contemplated railroad in the States of California and Oregon, and the Territories of Idaho and Utah, commencing at a point at or near the town of Davisville, County of Yolo, State of California; thence northerly through the Sacramento Valley; thence in a northeasterly direction, crossing the northern boundary of California, at a point near Goose Lake, to a point near Christmas Lake, in the State of Oregon; thence easterly through the State of Oregon, the Territory of Idaho, and the Territory of Utah, to Ogden City, Utah. Also from a point on the first-named route, in the bend of the Pitt river, near the 41st parallel of latitude, northwesterly to a junction in the State of Oregon with the railroad of the Oregon and California Railroad Company. Also from a point on the first-named route, near Christmas Lake, westerly to a junction with the railroad of the Oregon and California Railroad Company, at or near Lower Klamath Lake, in the State of Oregon. In all 943 miles of railroad, or thereabouts; which stock, so subscribed by us, amount to at least $1,000 per mile for each and every mile of the said railroad so intended to be built, and has been subscribed by us in good faith, and

TEN PER CENT. THEREON

In cash has been paid actually and in good faith, to Milton S. Latham, one of our number, who has been appointed and named by us as Treasurer for that purpose. And, also, being desirous of forming a corporation for the purpose aforesaid, do hereby, at a regular meeting of us, the said subscribers, held in pursuance of the statutes in such cases made and provided, and after due written notice thereof, given to each of us by the said Treasurer, adopted the following

ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION.

First—The undersigned, whose names are hereto subscribed, do hereby organize, form and become a corporation and body corporate under and in pursuance of an Act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled "An Act to provide for the incorporation of railroad companies, and the management of the affairs thereof, and other matters relating thereto," approved May 20, 1861, and the several Acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, for the purpose of owning, constructing and maintaining a railroad in the States of California and Oregon, and the Territories of Idaho and Utah, commencing at and from a point at or near the town of Davisville, County of Yolo, State of California; thence northerly through the Sacramento Valley; and thence in a northeasterly direction through the counties of Yolo, Tehama, Shasta and Siskiyou, in said State, crossing the northern boundary of California, at a point near Goose Lake, to a point near Christmas Lake, in the State of Oregon; thence easterly through the State of Oregon, the Territory of Idaho, and the Territory of Utah, to Ogden City, in Utah. Also, from a point on the first-named route, in the bend of the Pitt river, near the 41st parallel of latitude northwesterly to a junction in the State of Oregon, with the railroad of the Oregon and California Railroad Company. Also, from a point on the first-named route, near Christmas Lake, westerly to a junction with the railroad of the Oregon and California Railroad Company, at or near Lower Klamath Lake, in the State of Oregon; the length of the said railroad, as nearly as can be ascertained, being 943 miles.

ARTICLE SECOND.

The name of the corporation hereby formed and organized shall be and is "The California Pacific Railroad Eastern Extension Company," and the term of its existence shall be fifty years from the date thereof.

ARTICLE THIRD.

The capital stock of the said corporation shall be and is hereby fixed at $50,000,000, being the actual contemplated cost of constructing the said railroad—the cost of the right of way, motive power, and every other appurtenance and thing for the completion and running of the road, as nearly as can be estimated by competent engineers, and is divided into five hundred thousand shares, of the par value of one hundred dollars each.

ARTICLE FOURTH.

The number of Directors who shall manage the affairs of the said corporation shall be thirteen; and the names of the persons chosen to act as such Directors, and to hold their offices until others are elected, are: William F. Rodolfsen, San Francisco; Milton S. Latham, San Francisco; Richard Hammond, San Francisco; Isaac Friedlander, San Francisco; Albert Gansl, San Francisco; Eugene Sullivan, San Francisco; Faxton D. Atherton, San Francisco; John P. Jackson, Vallejo; A. DeLaski, London, England; Edward C. Green, London, England; Rudolph Sulzbach, Frankfurt-on-the-Main; Wm. Tillinghast, San Francisco; all of whom, either in person or by proxy, are subscribers to these articles of association, having duly paid the ten per cent. required by law upon their subscriptions.

In witness whereof, we have hereto subscribed our respective names, places of residence, and the number of shares by each of us respectively taken in said corporation, at the City and County of San Francisco, California, this 22d day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one.

A meeting of Directors was held on Tuesday, in this city, for permanent organization, and chose William F. Roelofsen for President; Colonel John P. Jackson, Vice President; Milton S. Latham, Treasurer; and W. H. L. Barnes, Secretary.

— Apropos of the instinct of carrier pigeons and other birds and animals in finding their way home over long distances, it is said "during the life of the celebrated sportsman, the late Sir Richard Sutton, a draught of hounds was sent up to London, by wagon, from the kennel near Lincoln, and there put on board a vessel to go abroad. While the ship was dropping down the Thames one of them jumped overboard, and swam ashore. Some weeks after it made its appearance at the kennel half starved, and covered with bites bestowed upon it by its more fortunate fellows. I regret to have to add that it was killed immediately, so many valuable hounds having recently been destroyed in that pack by madness that the huntsman was afraid to take it in."

— For all persons, especially invalids, a thin material of woollen gauze, next the skin, is safest and best for clothing, because it is a non-conductor, and carries heat from the body more slowly than cotton, linen or silk. The warmer the weather the more need for woollen next the skin. All garments worn next the skin during the day should be removed at night and spread out for thorough airing and drying. Cotton is the best material to be worn next the skin at night. All changes from a heavier to a lighter clothing in summer should be made by putting on the lighter clothing the first thing in the morning. It is safer for children, for invalids, and for old persons, to have too much clothing than too little.

— Scholar says: "I occasionally dabble in poetry, and my friends say that I have gut talenks. I send you one of my poems, wich took the prize in our town last zamination:

A REVERIE.

I had a dreme,	My eyes upon the sand
I thought I was alone, alone;	I bent, I bent.
O it did seme	I thort of other dase,
So sad, away from home, from home!	And things, and things;
My head upon my hand	Of happy, childish phase,
I lent, I lent;	And strings, and strings."

— The Bishop of London, at his ordination lately, in accordance with the recent decision in the case of "Hibbert v. Purchas," wore a cope. The best idea of its appearance that can be given to those who have not seen this vestment is a lady's waterproof corset. The cope of the Bishop of London is made of purple silk, lined with black silk and without trimmings. The cope was substituted for the chasuble. Remarks were made that the new dress was less dignified than the old Episcopal habit; it has, however, the merit that a Bishop is required to wear it only in the cathedral; and for such places which, even in summer, are often cold and draughty, it is not inappropriate.

— The Bedford News says: "A Lawrence county man planted a tree in front of his house, and named it after his wife. Soon the tree died, and the wife lived but a day or two after. Now you would be surprised at the number of men that are planting trees in front of their domicils, and naming them after their respective, if not respected, wives—and the sickliest-looking trees that can be found, too—trees that, with the tenderest care, cannot possibly live more than two weeks! The dodge is too thin. The women see through it, and have resolved not to die."

Special Brevities.

— The Scottish societies of New York having recently resolved to place a statue of Sir Walter Scott in the Central Park of that city, they have arranged with Mr. John Steel, R.S.A., for a copy of a bronze of the well-known marble figure in the Scott Monument, Princes' street. The statue will, it is expected, occupy an important site in the beautiful park at New York, and will be placed on a pedestal of Peterhead granite, designed by the sculptor, and sent out from England. Mr. Steel has engaged to supply the statue in the course of a year from this date, and the foundation-stone of the pedestal is intended to be laid with great ceremony on the 15th of August next.

— When the siege of Paris was commenced by the Prussians, the stores of wine were carefully estimated. At its close it was found that the wine had been consumed at the enormous rate of nearly eight million gallons per month. Under the reign of the Commune the consumption was even larger. This may account for some part of the terrible events we have seen, and supersede the necessity for inventing a theory of "contagious mental alienation" in the population of Belleville and Montmartre.

— A little girl, scarcely eight years of age, was arrested as she was in the act of throwing petroleum into a cellar. She said, "Ah, you will have enough to do if you want to take us all up, for there are eight thousand of us, and some smaller than I am." The police crammed the child with bonbons to elicit revelations from her which may put them on the track of these furies.

— There is a beautiful girl living near Montreal, who, notwithstanding the fact that she has lost both legs above her knees, has received over a dozen offers of marriage during the past year, and refused them all. One of her lovers is a member of the Dominion Parliament. This afflicted girl speaks seven languages, and charms everybody who comes near her.

— Miss Caroline Myers, of St. Louis, a charming young lady of twenty, attended a picnic, and after swinging for some time on a rope, complained of great headache and dizziness. On the way home she fell from her seat in the carriage and almost immediately expired. Verdict, death from apoplexy, caused by heat.

— Quality-Ladies: The influence of a fine house, graceful furniture, good libraries, well-ordered tables, trim servants, and, above all, a position to secure that one becomes unconscious of it, gives a harmony and refinement to the character and manners which we feel, even if we cannot explain.

— Some years ago a French writer said, "You will see one day of what a society without a God is capable. Paris will burn herself down with her own hands." Those who have visited the Pantheon there in past days will remember Voltaire's marble sarcophagus, with the sculptured hand thrust through the coffin-lid, waving a torch.

— The ruin caused in Paris by the civil war is estimated at 500,000,000 francs by the destruction of houses, and a further 300,000,000 francs by the loss of securities, valuables, and objects of art, and furniture burnt. 60,000,000 francs worth of property has been burnt in the docks and warehouses at Villette.

— Lady to Servant: "I think you will suit me, but seeing that you are in mourning, I hope you have not lost any dear relation?" Servant: "By no means, madam—only my three last mistresses. I never goes to a situation but the lady dies in about a month afterwards."

— Nearly all the missing pieces of the Vendôme Column have been recovered. It is thought the Column can be exactly restored. A strange proposal is made to preserve untouched the ruins of the Hôtel de Ville. It is seriously discussed, and finds many advocates.

— Bacchus, when he spent his evenings with Jupiter and choice spirits, waited on by that charming bar-maid Hebe, invariably had the blues next morning, until he got a wrinkle from Pan, who turned up fresh because he always took his pipe before going to bed.

— It is stated by the Sub-Governor of the Bank of France that the Communists have had from that establishment 9,401,000 francs out of its own funds, and 7,290,000 francs in virtue of an order from Versailles; or, in all, 16,691,000 francs (£667,640).

— The Communist Cluseret, who figured not very favorably in our late civil war, turns out to be the Fenian M'Anliff, who planned the attack on Chester Castle in 1867, and was present at the murder of Policeman Brett at Manchester.

— It is rumored in foreign and English newspapers that Moltke intends to visit England to witness the sham battle and military maneuvers which are to take place there this autumn.

— La Vérité estimates the recent destruction of property in Paris at eight hundred millions of francs, and merchandise in addition to the extent of sixty millions.

— The contract for grading the first twenty miles of the Oregon Central Railroad has been let, and the track will for nearly all the way follow the old road back.

— The eldest son of the Duc de Gramont, who is now nineteen years old, has left England for France, and enlisted as a volunteer in the Garde Mobile.

— By the South African mail we learn that the Cape Town Parliament is considering the proposed annexation of the diamond fields.

The Boy and the Brook.

ARMENIAN POPULAR SONG FROM THE PROSE VERSION OF ALISHAN.

Down from yon distant mountain high
The brooklet flows through the village street;
A boy comes forth to wash his hands,
Washing, yes washing, there he stands,
In the water cool and sweet.

"Brook, from what mountain dost thou come?
O my brooklet cool and sweet!"

"I come from yon mountain high and cold,
Where lieth the new snow on the old,
And melts in the summer heat."

"Brook, to what river dost thou go?
O my brooklet cool and sweet!"

"I go to the river there below
Where in bunches the violets grow,
And sun and shadow meet."

"Brook, to what garden dost thou go?
O my brooklet cool and sweet!"

"I go to that garden in the vale
Where all night long the nightingale
Her love-song doth repeat."

"Brook, to what fountain dost thou go?
O my brooklet cool and sweet?"

"I go to that fountain, at whose brink
The maid that loves thee comes to drink,
And, whenever she looks therein,
I rise to meet her, and kiss her chin,
And my joy is then complete."

An Awkward Coincidence.

British Finance.—Those who assert that John Bull has seen his best days and is no longer able to hold his own in a quarrel, should study a little more the facts and figures. The Clearing House returns for 1870 was £3,997,884,000, an increase of £303,925,000 this year, and is one of the most conclusive evidences of prosperity. The traffic of railways shows a net increase of £315,000, and the dividends of the joint banks are much larger, which is the more satisfactory because the low value of money for the last half of the year was unfavorable to banking. These are not exactly the usual symptoms of national decadence, and but for the depression resulting from the war in Europe, doubtless a still better showing would have been made.

— A man about thirty years of age, giving his name as Patrick Lynch, rushed into the Coroner's office at New York, last week, and said he had been commissioned by Christ to save the life of Mrs. Laura D. Fair, now under sentence of death for the murder of Colonel Crittenden. He added that Mrs. Fair was his lawful wife, and if she was hung he would also have to suffer death. He further said he had just left San Francisco, the authorities of which had offered to build a bridge to New York for him to cross. It being evident that the fellow was demented, he was taken to the Tombs Police Court.

— A party of civil engineers left Omaha on the 19th inst. for Evanston Station, to commence surveying a route for a railway and wagon road from that place northward via Bear River to the Nevada line; thence to Soda Springs, on Snake river; and thence northward to some point on the Northern Pacific Railroad. This road, which is being surveyed by the Union Pacific Company, will open a new route to Helena and Virginia City, Montana.

A Sensation Drama in 4 Acts.

BY JOSH BILLINGS.

Act first.—Enter a lap dorg, carrying a boarding skool miss in his arms, about 16 hands high—it makes the dorg puff—the dorg lays down the boarding skool miss, and orders mint juices for 2, with the usual suck-shun. The dorg begins to loll, the boarding skool miss tells him "tew dri up" (in French), and the dorg sez "he be darned if he will" (in dorg). [Grate sensashun among the awjence, with cries, "Put him out."] Finally a compromise iz affected, the boarding skool miss kisses the dorg, with tears in his eyes. Konklusion—Lap dorg discovers a wicked flea at work on his tale—purses him—round and round tha go—dorg a lettle ahead—sunbudy hollers out "mad dorg!"—boarding skool girl faints standing—the curtain drops.

Act number 2.—Curtin highsts—sevril blind men in the distance, looking thru a key whole—one of them sez, "he don't see it!" A shanghi raster comes out, with epaulets on, and crows Yankee Doodle—mnsik bi the band. The shankhi lays an egg on the stage, about the size of a wasp's nest, and then limps oph, very much tired and reduced. Curtin falls agin.

Act number 3.—Curtin rises slioly—big bolona sarsage on a tabel—bolona sarsage lifts up her head, and begins tew bark—band plays "Old Dorg Tray." Cat cums in—cat's tail begins to swell bad—bolona sarsage and cat haz a fite—tha fite 14 rounds—the stage is covered with cats and dorgs. Konklushun—tha awl jine hands and walk to the footlights—an old bull tarrier reads the President's call for "300,000 more"—band plays "Go to Lemons!"—a bell rings, and the curtain drops.

Act number 4.—A scene on the Eri kanal—a terribel storm rages—the kanal acks bad—sevril line botes go down hed fust, with awl their boarders on board—kant make a lee shore—tha drag their ankera—sum of the kapitins tri tew pra, but most of them hev the best luck at swareing—the water is strewed with pots and kettles—sevril of the cook maids swim ashore, with their cook stoves in their teeth—tha hev to draw oph the kanal to stop the storm. Konklusion—men are seen along on the banks of the kanal speering ded horses and eels—band plays "a life on the oshun wave." Amid tremendous applauze the curtain falls, and the awjence disperse, single file.

Murder Will Out—A Dramatic Scene.—A most extraordinary scene occurred in April at the Police Office, Geelong, Australia. Seventeen years ago, Bookhouse, a shepherd, was missed. Fifteen years after, his remains were found buried beneath a heap of stones, and identified by his boots, pipe and portions of his clothing. The police obtained a clue which they have been two years following up. At length they arrested a man called Geary, and his wife, and they were brought up for examination. Between the prisoner's dock and the bench, on a table, was laid the skeleton with the boots on the feet still, as found. It was covered with a rug. During the proceedings the rug was suddenly removed. The male prisoner started backward, becoming lividly pale. The woman's face was distorted with horror, and none who saw it can forget that look of terror, anguish and remorse as long as they live. Poor old Brookhouse's bones indeed arose, as it were, in judgment.

Wonderful Cave in Decotah.—This cave is a vertical fissure in the face of limestone rock. It varies from two to eight feet in width and considerably in height. In winter weather there is no ice, but as summer approaches the sides become incrustated with layer after layer, till in the extreme heat of summer it is in the greatest quantity. That the coldness which causes this is dependent upon the increased heat increasing evaporation, is the theory, but as the effect is confined to this one spot, will our scientists investigate and explain?

Darwinism.—However startling Darwin's theory of the origin of man may be, there is no new idea involved. In Hindoostan such has been one of the creeds of certain native philosophers of old, and some men have gone so far as to aver that their doctrine of physical progression is the origin of caste in India. At any rate it may be only another ramification or branch of the ancient Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration of souls.

Ice-Making in New Zealand.—Ice-making is in successful operation in Auckland. Mr. Gledhill makes two tons per day, which he wholesales at four cents per pound and retails at eight cents per pound. His machine is four-horse power, purchased from Siebe Brothers, of London, for £4,500. The expense is about $7 50 per day.

—Baron Rothschild has given the sum of £1,000 to French, the jockey who rode Favonius, the winner of this year's Derby, and has bestowed upon him an annuity of £200 for life.

The Mango Tree.

He wiled me through the furzy croft; 'Tis I, not they, am gone and dead;
 He wiled me down the sandy lane; They live, they know, they feel, they see;
 He told his boy's love, soft and oft, Their spirits light the golden shade
 Until I told him mine again. Beneath the giant mango-tree.

We married, and we sailed the main; All things, save I, are full of life;
 A soldier, and a soldier's wife, The minas, pluming velvet breasts;
 We marched thro' many a burning plain; The monkeys, in the foolish strife;
 We sighed for many a gallant life. The swooping hawks, the awing nests

But his—God kept it safe from harm. The lizards basking on the soil,
 He toiled and dared and earned command, The butterflies who sun their wings,
 And those three stripes upon his arm, The bees about their household toil,
 Were more to me than gold or land. They live, they love, the blissful things.

Sure he would win some great renown: Each tender purple mango-shoot,
 Our lives were strong, our hearts were true, That folds and droops so bashful down;
 One night the fever struck him down. [high] It lives; it sucks some hidden root;
 I sat, and stared, and saw him die. It rears at last a broad green crown.

I had his children—one, two, three. It blossoms, and the children cry—
 One week I had them, blithe and sound. "Watch when the mango-apples fall;"
 The next—beneath this mango-tree, It lives; but rootless, fruitless, I—
 By him in barrack burying-ground. I breathe and dream—and that is all.

I sit beneath the mango-shade; Thus am I dead: yet cannot die;
 I livemy five years' life all o'er— But still within my foolish brain
 Round yonder stems his children played; There hangs a pale blue evening sky;
 He mounted guard at yonder door. A furzy croft; a sandy lane.

The Social Pitch Caldron.

The civil war of the last two months cannot but concentrate political thought on the vast discontent which bred it, and on the state of education among the masses which gave so much currency to Utopian delusions and aggravated the crimes of the closing scenes. It is of little use to say that the motive power is only envy—that in the nineteenth century, notwithstanding better wages and more comfort, the artisans have not got beyond the ideas which produced a Jack Cade rebellion. The phenomenon will not be got rid of by hard times, even if it deserves them, and the unstable equilibrium it creates will be a continual source of anxiety. And the actual history of the insurrection, tho' the insurgents and their allies have temporarily lost power and prestige, will certainly aggravate the discontent and danger. The misery resulting will be fresh stimulus to passion, while there has been nothing like the failure of an experiment to make the Socialist doctrine unpopular with reflecting artisans. The Commune, they may say, never had a chance. It had to fight for dear life from the very beginning, and could not get beyond the organization of a camp. The partial Socialist experiments that were tried; they may add, were so far not unsuccessful. The whole circumstances of Paris for many months were such as to necessitate a State organization for satisfying the ordinary wants of living, and the organization did not break down. Why not render permanent an arrangement which was possible under the stress of a siege, and which at least bestowed on the artisans of Paris a state of comfort which they had not before enjoyed. There is thus nothing in the history to create a distrust among workmen of the theories to which they have been prone. The spirit in which the insurrection has been suppressed, as all must recognize, will also aggravate the evil. They were hated, the artisans will say, with a perfect hatred, because the bourgeoisie, the capitalists, the State pensionaries, the gentlemen were eager to get back to their money-getting and luxury, and would not even consider whether a more equal share for all at the banquet of life was not possible. We cannot but conceive therefore as most formidable during the next few years the state of mind among the artisan classes, not only in France itself, but by sympathy throughout the whole Continent of Europe. The discontent which bred the insurrection will have been aggravated, and even apart from the interest which the insurrection itself will rouse, should concentrate the thoughts of politicians on the means of averting the calamities involved in the existence of such feelings. No such stimulus should be necessary, but its operation may still be beneficent.—Spectator.

A Lady Enamoured of the Chinese Giant Chang.—Chang, the Chinese giant, who, it will be remembered, was exhibited here, is at present in Australia. A lady resident of Pleasant Valley lately presented Chang with a magnificent bouquet, and asked to be allowed to kiss his Celestial countenance. Chang blushed, but was induced to consent. The kiss settled the lady's mind on the subject, and she submitted to the tallest man in the world a schedule of her property, principally consisting of large shares in the successful North Cross Reef Mining Company, with all of which she would endow him if made Mrs. Chang. Unsuccessful in her first overtures, she has followed him to Ballarat, urging the increasing value of her property and her ardent love for him as worthy of his acceptance.

Love of Children.

Lord Palmerston produced much scandal and a good deal of amusement by promulgating the heretical theory that all people are born good. Without discussing the theological bearings of this doctrine, we may at least say that it will hardly bear inspection from a scientific point of view. Rudimentary virtues are conspicuous in little children as rudimentary virtues. Let anybody observe candidly a child of two or three years old. There is scarcely any defect which it would not be possible for an unprejudiced person to discover. Such a child may be benevolent, courageous, and conscientious according to its little lights. But certainly it is also very apt to be sensual, selfish, and spiteful, and to show these qualities with a frankness which generally disappears in later life. It is greedy without blushing; it will appropriate the belongings of its little brothers and sisters with the utmost coolness; and it will tell lies as soon as it begins to discover what is the use of language. Painters generally please themselves by portraying infant saints and martyrs; but, if they were anxious to indulge in realistic representations, they would have no trouble in finding models for infant Judases, Calns, or Sapphiras. We generally excuse the misdeeds on the ground that our infant darlings know no better; but, if we insisted upon strict impartiality, the same argument would take all the merit out of their virtues. Children, indeed, sometimes develop the feelings of an advanced civilization with a precocity which is rather amusing. Thackeray, than whom nobody was a greater lover of children, somewhere relates an instructive anecdote. Half-a-dozen children are playing with a puppy, and manufacturing mud-pies. To them enters a companion, and exclaims, "Mary Jane, your sister has found a penny!" Straightway the puppy is put down as if it were so much dross, the mud-pies are abandoned, and the little band of courtiers gathers round the infant millionaire and accompanies her to the apple-stall. Were not these infants in course of preparation—if only the Fates were propitious—to appear in some future Book of Snobs?

In spite of all which, we may safely return to the proposition that, whatever logical justification may or may not be discovered, a love of small children is a very great test of a really amiable character. People who confess to a certain sympathy with Herod may produce a considerable body of argument in defense of their infantile propensities; but we cannot admit that they are in the right of the question. The doctrine, in fact, which lies at the base of their reasoning may be easily met. We have, in fact, been arguing on the hypothesis that we ought to love the most virtuous people the best. If that theory be admitted without qualification, it would be very hard to make out a case on behalf of infants. We need not, however, look twice to discover the fallacy of the argument. It was by assuming the truth of this proposition that certain philosophers of the last century discovered that the family affections ought to be put down as anti-social. Why, they inquired, should we love our brother merely because he happens to be the son of our father and mother, though he may be an unmitigated scamp? The consequences of admitting this doctrine are obvious. We should all prefer the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Prime Minister, and the Lord Chancellor, who, as need hardly be argued, must be the most perfect specimens of humanity extant, to any of our relations. No family could hold together if a father were always more occupied with the prosperity of those officials than of the welfare of his children. The parental instinct, which in its unattached form is the basis of a love of children in general, is to be encouraged, not because it is reasonable, but because it is the most essential of all instincts to a healthy condition of society. A philoprogenitive race will, on the whole, bring up the best generation of successors, and philoprogenitiveness implies that general taste for all infants which to bachelors and cynical persons generally sometimes appears decidedly anomalous. Admitting the propriety of the feeling as society is at present constituted, perhaps we may be allowed an occasional passing regret that boys are not differently managed. Mr. Darwin speculates upon the consequences which would ensue if human societies were arranged on the plan of beehives. In that case, he thinks it probable that fratricide would be considered as a virtue. When such Utopian theories are under discussion, we may ask whether it would not have been as well if the dreams of these philosophers had been carried out, and each nation provided with a common nursery.

When one looks upon a baby in a purely philosophical spirit; when one considers the very minute indications of reasoning faculty of which it is capable; when one proceeds to remark the obstacles which mothers, aunts, and women in general are accustomed to testify on some vague imitation of reasonable behavior, one cannot repress a momentary regret that so much good affection should be discharged upon an insensible object. Is it, one asks with some surprise, a subject for legitimate exultation that a minute fragment of humanity should have learnt the lesson which thousands of millions of human beings have learnt before it, and be just able to stick two syllables together? Or is the fact that an infant is gradually learning to exercise some sort of control over the motion of its limbs to be regarded by sensible people in the light of an unprecedented phenomenon? Surely there are people enough in the world who, if weighed in any sensible balance, are at least as deserving of affection and would be infinitely more capable of appreciating and returning it. But we feel the danger of pursuing this vein of thought. We have no desire to shock prosaic persons without necessity, and we therefore freely avow, as our profound and immovable opinion, that, as things are at present constituted—and we can see no reason whatever for supposing that any material change is likely to take place within any conceivable period—mothers ought to love their children. Indeed, we go further; we admit that a man is the better in proportion as he retains certain feminine instincts and has something of his mother in his character; and, that being so, we will venture to argue that a love of children is generally a harmless and even a laudable instinct. Carried to excess, it is perhaps rather inconsistent with patriotism and cosmopolitanism, and we observe that universal philanthropists—who, of course, are the best of men—are apt to be slightly callous upon this point. But for the mass of mankind we have no hesitation in admitting that those who love children the most must be reckoned amongst the most exemplary of the species.—Saturday Review.

— We had supposed the Pacific Churchman newspaper was no longer published, but the Chronicle says it has come out in a new dress. Possibly, however, this is a mistake, arising from the fact that the snuffling gospeler who edited the painful concern has been sneaking about the streets with a new six-bit shirt on. We regard the purchase of this garment as a piece of sinful extravagance, but it is in no sense "a new dress." And while contemplating it, we seem to see its owner devoutly kneeling in that brief attire, and offering up the following evening supplication: "O Lord, I confess that some weeks ago I assailed the News Letter like unto one of the wicked, and am deserving of no more mercy than I am likely to get. Nevertheless, O Lord, if I may not expect mercy, let me take refuge in contempt, and let it be done unto thy servant even as men do unto a dog that has been rolling where a dog ought not to roll: let that servant be avoided. I have been told, O Lord, that I am but a scurvy cur, and I believe it; for lo! the News Letter man hath filled me with lime juice, and the same is in repute for scurvy. Notwithstanding, O Lord, my unworthiness to carry entrails to a bear, let not Bishop Kip bend his green goggles upon me in wrath, for my punishment is already greater than I can stand. Having the plague of the itch, shall I have that of lice also? Outch, Lord! I feel a nipping rat invading with keen tooth my unprotected heel, but behold I will not rise: I will be a martyr. For now thy servant feels that in the economy of nature he shall not be wholly wasted: he is good for the rats to eat. Amen!"

— Following is the opening spasm of the oration delivered at the Mechanics' Pavilion July 4th: "Fellow Citizens and American Eagles—When Freedom from her mountain height unfurled the Mayflower, the despotism of tottering Europe hid their diminished heads under a bushel of chaff. Then the bright arch of Liberty spanned the wondering nations with civil and religious toleration, and the Palladium of our proud nationality spread her wide wings in the blaze of free republican institutions. There never was—no, fellow citizens, there never will be—I say it without the fear of successful contradiction, and unabashed before the despotisms of effete Europe—there never will be, fellow citizens—never, I swear it, never, never! Let us, oh! patriotic Eagles—let us soar aloft into the blue empyrean of universal emancipation, and swear we will never sheath the sword until the blessings of civil and religious liberty shall—fellow citizens—shall—yes, shall totter to their fall. And that is what is the matter with Hannah, fellow citizens—that is what is the matter with Hannah!" At this unexpected burst of his own eloquence, Judge Sawyer's emotion mastered him, and he stood rigidly upon his head. The stars on a neighboring banner winked mysteriously, the stripes curled into a distracting snarl, and a wooden eagle in the audience snapped his beak solemnly, and laid a candy egg. Some brass instruments belonging to a band stretched out straight and yawned hideously. Our reporter impelled a dead cat at random, and was kicked out. Hooray!

— John Reed, of Illinois, is a man who knows his rights, and knowing dares maintain. Having communicated to a young lady his intention of conferring upon her the honor of his company at a Fourth of July celebration, John was pained and disgusted to hear the proposal quietly declined. John went away thoughtfully to a neighbor who keeps a double-shotgun. This he secured, and again sought the object of his hopeless preference. The object was seated at the dinner table contending with her lobsouse, and did not feel his presence near. Mr. Reed poised and sighted his artillery, and with the very natural remark, "I think this! fetcher," he exploded the twin charges. A moment later might have been seen the rare spectacle of a headless young lady sitting bolt upright at table and spooning a wad of hash into the top of her neck. The wall opposite presented the appearance of having been bombarded with fresh livers and baptized with sausage-meat. The telegraph obscurely adds that no one in the vicinity slept any that night. They were probably busy getting ready for the Fourth: the gentlemen going about inviting the ladies to attend the celebration, and the ladies hastily and unconditionally accepting.

— On Tuesday last there was a cricket match between married men upon one side and bachelors on the other, in which the latter were shamefully defeated. Being a scoffer at idle and childish pastimes, we construe this as a powerful argument in favor of remaining single. It is true, a great deal may be said on the other side, but it is for the ladies to say it.

Bachelor's Buttons.

How many a man who might have dwelt Mother-of-pearl, cut into discs,
 In single bliss for life, Mother-in-law involves.
 Before a woman's feet has knelt The hapless wretch, at fearful risks,
 And asked her for a wife, The bitter question solves,
 Because (shamefall each laundress shut on) "Too oft" he breaks his teeth that nut on He'd no one to sew on a button. "Will no one sew me on a button?"
 His peace and freedom he resigns, Ah, if I only knew the man,
 And lays his latch-key down; I'd pour down wealth in floods,
 Forsakes his club (which is hard lines) On him who hit upon the plan
 Gives up his rooms in town Of fixing things with studs:
 Because (return we to our mutton) I'd give him gold to sate a glutton,
 He's no one to sew on a button! Who taught men not to care a button

For now no female wiles I dread,
 In single bliss unmixed;
 My fate once hung upon a thread,
 But now by studs 'tis fixed.
 So let these words my tomb be cut on,
 "This bachelor ne'er cared a button!"

Our Labor Exchange.

The California Labor and Employment Exchange held its third annual meeting on Thursday last (July 6th). The Secretary, Mr. Zeehandelaar, handed in his report for the year, which was accompanied by most valuable and carefully compiled statistics. We regret very much our inability, through the pressure on our columns, to do more than take a cursory glance at the same, which is quite voluminous. From the Secretary's able report we extract the following: "It will not be inappropriate to bring the important facts to public attention that up to the present time the Exchange has found employment for 19,550 men and 8,852 women—total, 29,442 persons; or for this year 1,715 men and 2,146 women—total, 3,861 persons of both sexes. Orders were received in the men's department for about 2,600 persons. During the year ending June 30, 1871, the number employed according to nationality is as follows: Americans, 313; Austrians, 4; Belgians, 4; Danes, 23; English, 185; French, 27; Germans, 279; Irish, 663; Italians, 8; Netherlanders, 7; Norwegians, 15; Poles, 1; Portuguese, 2; Russians, 5; Scotch, 29; Swedes, 28; Swiss, 13; Spanish, 2; various and unknown, 107. Total, 1,715. During the same year the women employed are as follows: American, 324; Irish, 1,648; German, 49; various, 125. Total, 2,146. Total for the last three years, 8,852. So long as the Labor Exchange is maintained in its present shape, there is no necessity whatever for the existence of a solitary healthy pauper in our streets. Previous to the establishment of the Labor Exchange, paupers were able to claim that they had no definite means of getting work; but its existence takes away that excuse, and brings indiscriminate alms-giving within the pale of those offenses which increase vice and establish nurseries for ultimate addition to our City and State Prisons." According to this report there is no earthly cause for the various forms of pauperism in our midst, as the supply very seldom exceeds the demand for good men or women who prefer honest independence to hanging around the streets of our city. There is no free gratuity of any kind asked for or taken at the Exchange, from either the employers or the employed. The demand for labor during the past year has not been as brisk as formerly, but owing to various causes the supply has been proportionally less, while the rates of wages have suffered little or no reduction. We are glad to learn that the Exchange is entirely free from the encumbrance of debt of any kind. The same Board of active Trustees was re-elected, viz.: Ira P. Rankin, C. V. Gillespie, Chas. E. McLane, Wm. Alvord, I. Friedlander, J. B. Roberts and E. L. Sullivan.

— A cheerful kind of mining is carried on at Grass Valley. A small cannon is used to knock down the rock, and the other day, after performing the duty expected of it, the ball went pottering leisurely about the mine, and ended by spotting a man in the jaw. As there is now a vacancy, we suggest that a recruiting sergeant be sent there.

— Some carping bonybody is inquiring what became of the Kossuth fund. Kossuth fund! Ah! yes, it was so long ago. We do not remember just how, and by whom, it was stolen.

— A correspondent wishes to know why people always put camphor on their dead relatives. Because it smells bad and they happen to have it in the house, we suppose.

— An Italian, forty-three years of age, has been sent to the Insane Asylum. He has a son of twenty-seven. We did not learn if there were other evidence of insanity.

Special Brevities.

— David Hoffman, of Wooster, Ohio, is to be commiserated. David is troubled with spirits of the spiritual, not spirituous, kind. They take David's good clothes, steal his money, irritate his lovely daughters, cut their petticoats, spoil the carpets, and perpetrate similar annoyances. What to do about it David cannot discover, and a reporter of whom he sought consolation is equally undecided, as his (the reporter's) new spring hat was slashed into ribbons while its owner was colloquially and professionally occupied in the next room. Altogether the Wooster are the bully spirits of the period, so far as achievements are concerned, and they will yet be the death, as they have been the pecuniary ruin, of poor David. Meanwhile he exercises his fruitless exorcising.

— Some interesting evidence has been given before a select committee of the House of Commons by Mr. Lambert, poor-law inspector, on the subject of expenditure for relief of the poor in London. It was stated that the total charge last year was £1,466,000, against £976,000 in 1866, and that the effect of union chargeability as against parochial was illustrated in a remarkable manner in the case of a certain City parish which, prior to the Act of 1862, maintained only two paupers at a cost to the ratepayers of £20 a year each. After the passing of the act incorporating the parish in the union it had to contribute £1,200 per annum, so that the two paupers now cost that particular parish £600 a year each.

— The sixty girls that are to welcome the returning army at the Brandenburg Gate have had a meeting at the Town Hall, in which the question of their attire was definitively settled. It is to be that of Margaret in Kaubach's sketch of her first meeting with Faust. Two plaits of their own hair hanging down the back are indispensable. They are pledged mutually and to the municipal authorities on no account to use false hair. It is an attempt definitively to get rid of the chignon, which will probably prove successful; for they have resolved—the one encouraging the other—after once having risked it, to keep to the plaits. Sixty wealthy young ladies may do much—perhaps as much as an empress.

— Certain photographs exist of the ruins of the Vendôme Column, in which the portraits of a number of National Guards, in triumphal attitudes, are plainly recognizable. Each of those heads, we learn from Galignani, after having been enlarged, has now been placed in the hands of the detective police. A series of views of the principal barricades also were published just before the troops entered Paris, and several hundred portraits of insurgents are given. The likenesses will in many cases lead to the condemnation of the men so depicted.

— The Moniteur Scientifique contains a paper, by Dr. G. Declat, "On the Preservation of Raw Meat, Fish, Eggs, or Vegetables, by the use of Phenicated Water." The process is exceedingly simple. The substance to be preserved is immersed in an aqueous solution of perfectly pure carbolic acid, and then dried. It is said that the process has been tried with much success. If sugar and salt were used at the same time, the preserved meat would have a better flavor.

— A Detroit druggist has on exhibition something that the Detroit Free Press calls "a strange curiosity." It is the hand and part of the arm of a man, perfectly petrified, but still showing every wrinkle of the flesh, the nails on the fingers, and the joints. The cords and muscles can be distinctly traced in the stone. It was found near a Missouri battle-field, and is believed to be a relic of surgical work, the arm seeming to have the appearance of being unjointed at the elbow.

— All traces of the late struggle in Paris are being rapidly obliterated. Numbers of visitors are flocking to the city, but few of them remain long; the majority departing immediately after visiting the principal scenes of the conflict and ruins. Meanwhile the prices of the restaurants have gone up about 25 per cent. since last year, though the articles themselves, so far from improving, have deteriorated in quality.

— An ingenious German has gained a great reputation in New York by his success in training coach horses to a grand gait. He used no burr-bit or other cruel contrivance, and people couldn't see how he did it, until it was found that he put magnifying goggles upon his horses, which made cobble stones look like boulders, and they acquired a grand tread by trying to step over them.

— The number of emigrants who left the ports of Ireland in the first four months of the present year was above nine per cent. less than in the corresponding period of last year. The numbers are 15,500 males and 9,781 females, making a total of 25,281, being 1,982 males and 642 females fewer than in the first four months of 1870.

— At the moment a convoy of prisoners arrived at Versailles recently, one of them addressed the officer in command and claimed the right to be placed in a separate cell, stating that he was M. Dereure, a member of the Commune. The truth or his assertion having been proved, he was immediately shot.

— The table on which the Versailles peace preliminaries were signed has been presented to Prince Bismarck as a souvenir, and is placed in the reception room of the princess, a small silver plate recording its historical significance. Where is the inevitable clock?

— Union Insurance Company held its annual meeting on the 12th inst. From the statement for the fiscal year we take the following: Assets, $1,035,848, and liabilities $943,416, showing a net surplus of $92,432.

Court Chat.

— What are the American bachelors about? One by one they are suffering all their great beauties and great heiresses to be carried off by foreigners. Another great conquest has been achieved by Prussia. Miss May Parsons, the brilliant belle of the last season at Compiegne, has just become Princess de Lynar. The Prince is on the staff of King William, and the old Kaiser is said to have taken such great interest in the successful issue of the courtship, that he has expressed a wish that the marriage should take place in Berlin. But even the commands of the Kaiser fell powerless before the resolution of the little American girl, who insisted on being married at her native place, Columbus, Ohio, refusing even the compromise suggested by diplomacy, that of having the marriage ceremony performed at Washington, by the Chaplain to the Prussian Embassy. The Prince de Lynar was therefore compelled to make the journey to Columbus, passing through London on his way thither a few weeks ago. Such is the description observed on the Royal Staff, that the Prince was vain merely to hunt at his impatience to start forth on his love chase, never daring to ask point blank for the counté. But Kaiser William good-naturedly set the lover's heart at rest by turning to the Prince at the grand banquet given at Berlin in honor of the return of the Royal Staff while the various toasts were being proposed, and saying, "Prince de Lynar, I drink to the health of your American fiancee, and may we soon behold her at your side here in Germany. A pleasant voyage, Prince, and a safe return amongst us!" The next day the Prince received his leave of absence, and started home Berlin immediately. So the resignation of Count Gortz, who has been five-and-twenty years Prussian Ambassador at Washington, gives rise to a rumor that he will be replaced by the Prince de Lynar, who was for some time Secretary to Count Gortz at Paris.

— The Queen on the 23d ultimo gave a breakfast, from half-past four to half-past seven o'clock, in the gardens of Buckingham Palace, where tents had been erected and preparations made for the occasion. Notwithstanding the desolate state of the weather, the ladies' toilets were very elegant, and of as light a material as the thermometer would sanction. What we should describe as a peary-dove color seemed a favorite, and dresses were worn rather short. The Queen was attired in black; the dress of silk; the black bonnet being trimmed with white lace. The Princess of Wales wore a very becoming costume of satin, of a nuance between amber and yellow, trimmed with black lace. The bonnet was of tulle, with dark leaves. The gentlemen were en rose, white waistcoats, light trousers and black ties, and also, in many cases, wore orders and decorations. The Prince of Wales and the other Princes were in deep blue frock coats with gold buttons.

— It is well known that the Crown Princess of Prussia, eldest daughter of Queen Victoria, is a most talented painter and limner, and that her beautiful sketches of English and Italian scenery, and her portraits of many celebrities of Europe, have found admirers even among professional men, who bestow the highest encomiums on the delicacy of touch and the poetry of conception which distinguish her productions. The Crown Princess has of late contributed quite a number of these delightful little sketches to fairs for the benefit of wounded soldiers in different parts of the Empire, and the price paid amounted, in one instance, to nearly nine hundred dollars.

— The most eccentric Princess in Germany is the Princess Caroline, who lords it over the great and important principality of Reuss-Schleiz-Greiz. She hates the Prussian Court intensely, and never lets an opportunity to slight it go by. The other day the French prisoners confined at the capital of the small principality were released. The Princess gave them a splendid banquet, and had from all officers and privates, driven to the railway depot in her court carriages, while the Prussian escort did not get anything to eat, and had to march on foot.

— Constant receptions took place at the Vatican in honor of the Pope's jubilee. Three thousand pilgrims arrived. The members of the Diplomatic body were received on the 17th, 20th and 21st. A great number of houses were illuminated, as well as all the churches. An anti-Papal manifestation on a large scale was made, the crowd marching through the streets singing and breaking the windows of some of the houses that were illuminated.

— It is reported in St. Petersburg that the Emperor Alexander II. of Russia, previous to his recent departure for Germany, took a solemn pledge to abstain entirely from spirituous liquors. The German Courts have been privately informed of this, and, in consequence, no wine will be offered to anybody at the repasts at which the Czar is present.

— In the course of the Tichborne trial, recently, it was arranged that the hearing should be adjourned on or about the 15th of July until about the 15th of November. In the afternoon the Prince and Princess of Wales entered the court and were accommodated with places in the gallery. They remained until the adjournment.

— The anniversary of the Queen's accession to the throne was celebrated recently with the usual royal demonstrations. Royal salutes were fired at most of the military establishments and by the vessels of war in port. Her Majesty has now entered upon the thirty-fifth year of her reign.

— The Emperor of Germany had an extraordinary ovation recently, and could not resist the temptation; he received an address from 100 pretty girls, and "looted" the speaker at once of a kiss. A gay old gentleman.

Molly's Letter.

DEAR OLD NEWS LETTER:—What a strange thing color is, and how differently the same shade appears to different eyes. Philosophers try to persuade us that no such thing as color exists, that it is an optical delusion. I suppose that they know best, and when I walk along Montgomery street and see the badly assorted colors that are on the backs of some women, I do begin to think that I am dreaming. The beauty of it is, that every woman thinks herself the correct thing and criticizes other passers-by—superciliously, too. Mrs. 1866 Comstock, as she flaunts along with the last fashions from Paris, ere Paris gates were closed, looks scornfully on the quiet, sad-colored robe of Mrs. Flowery Pekoe, while she, with a quiet glance from under her curved eyebrows, looks reproachfully at the flounces, flowers and lace that glare in the sunshine. Others pass along clad in inharmonious tints. There is a French actress going to rehearsal. Her light morning dress, dragged out of a tightly-packed trunk, as you can tell by the creases, is sufficiently lifted up to show a dirty, open-worked petticoat. She is late, and pegs along the pavement like all women, raising her skirts to give greater freedom of motion. Her chapeau has been flung on her head and a jacket on her shoulders, and yet with all this disorder the colors blend properly and naught offends the eyes. I went to the French Church last Monday to hear the solemn mass for the soul of the murdered Archbishop of Paris and his attendant priests. It struck me that they had better have prayed for the murderers. That's not what I was going to say. I noticed that the curiosity mongers were more numerous than the faithful, and that the Heretics outnumbered the Papists. Now, there ought to be a countersign on entering, such as Free Masons use; for example, the proper manner of making the sign of the cross, in the same way that the early Christians acted. But this crowd was common and vulgar, and was disappointed because the church was all in black and the music was sad and bad. One woman, with a black hat and violet-colored feather, stood in order that she might better behold the elevation of the host, whilst the whole of thy congregation were humbly prostrate. The preacher consoled his hearers by telling them that for the last three hundred years the church of perfidious Albion has been at peace, whilst that of Rome has been incessantly torn by factions. That is neither true nor logical. A small artistical scandal took place last week. A little comfortable looking man, with a baritone voice and Eastern reputation, came here some time ago, sang at concerts, got into society, dressed in clean linen and fared sumptuously at his hotel. He was called to Sacramento to sing. He went, and days passed but he returned not. The landlord began to think that if the artist's note could be as sostenuto as that he had with the hotel he must be a great singer, and went to his room. There was his trunk. It was light; he shook it; something rattled within. He forced the lock and found a very old pair of boots. I picked up a volume of Anastasius, the other day, and opened at the part where the church painter, whose wife sat for his virgins, always painted her ugly when she was in the sulks. Now, we might adapt this to our domestic life. Let every household be furnished with an instantaneous photograph apparatus, and when any froward gesture or cross look comes over one's husband, turn the knob and take it off. Then carefully inscribe the date and incidents, place the illustration opposite, and put away the album for future reference. I went on Tuesday to Platt's Hall to hear Mrs. Cady Stanton. Spite of myself I could not help admiring her. With her sleek face and white curly hair she looked like a London Chancery barrister in comfortable practice. Her voice is particularly pleasing, and she has none of the shrillness of the shrew, that the foregone strong-minded ones possessed. Mrs. Pitts Stevens, who acted as bottle-holder, must have felt proud, for the vast audience applauded her. It was very unlike the last time I saw her in public, when she spun round the room in a melancholy polka with the man who had the customless tea-stand at their Fair. Mrs. Stanton spoke for more than an hour without halting, and was amusing if not logical, and ladylike if not profound, which is more than we can say of the others. Were all women like her I would join her cause with my heart and soul, for I think I am as qualified, mentally, to vote as many men I know, but she cannot avoid this dilemma: If women are to have the franchise, all women are to vote, and Topsy, who was raised on a plantation, and Biddy, who was brought up with the pigs, have an equal right to go to the polls with Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony. By the way, Miss Anthony went bobbing around after the lecture, and she reminded me of Mr. Thiers in petticoats. Her nice, quiet Sacramento brother must be rather bored by the escapades of his sister. She made a mess of it when she got up the theatrical display of the mother and daughter of Mrs. Fair at her lecture. It was deservedly a failure; the audience should have laughed, not hissed. It is sad to think that women of such superior mind as these two lecturers should descend to vulgar clap-trap in order to entice applause. If such is their argument, their cause is hopeless. Besides, it is hosh to talk about men alone causing women to fall, for what does a French author say, "C'est la femme qui perd la femme. Avec l'homme la femme se retrouve." Yours, MOLLY.

— Matthew Brady, of the Fire Department, has been presented by his admirers with a silver trumpet. From the fact that we have seen something about this horn in every newspaper in the city, we infer that Mr. Brady has been rather zealously tooting it.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

The officers of the San Francisco Branch Mint have completed their official reports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, and sent them on to the Department at Washington. The report of the Melter and Refiner, J. P. Cochrane, shows that he operated upon 2,153,576.42 ounces gold, on which the legal wastage was 4,307.15 ounces, and the actual wastage 327.65 ounces. The total amount of silver received was 1,451,941.64 ounces, on which the legal wastage was 2,908.04 ounces, and the actual excess 921.59 ounces. In the previous year the same officer received 1,834,141 ounces gold; legal wastage, 3,678 ounces; actual wastage, 114 ounces. Silver received, 924,837 ounces; legal wastage, 1,850 ounces; excess, 1,151 ounces, consisting of silver extracted from gold. The apparent heavy gold wastage for the past year is due to the fact that a considerable amount of gold bullion heretofore pressed to the credit of the Melter and Refiner, was, during the year just closed, credited to another account. The total coinage for the past year was:

GOLD.
Double Eagles.....	$17,660 000
Eagles.....	80,000
Half Eagles.....	85,000
Quarter Eagles.....	40,000
Total Gold.....	$17,865,000
SILVER.
Half Dollars.....	722,000
Quarter Dollars.....	7,725
Dimes.....	14,000
Half Dimes.....	8,050

Total—Gold and Silver.....$18,616,775

The whole amount of Gold ingots received was $1,788,189.53 ounces. The actual wastage in the manipulation of the above was as follows, as compared with the legal wastage allowed by the Mint laws:

	Ounces.	Value.
Legal Wastage.....	2,682.23	$49,902 88
Actual Wastage.....	37.02	$74 79
	2,645.21	$49,028 09

The total amount of Silver ingots received was 1,307,015.15 ounces, on which the legal and actual wastage were as follows:

	Ounces.	Value.
Legal Wastage.....	2,114.03	$2,017 53
Actual Wastage.....	02.04	78 68
	2,351.09	$2,938 85

The above is a very satisfactory exhibit, and reflects great credit upon the Coiner's Department.

Imports of coal from January 1st to July 1st are as follows:

Anthracite, tons.....	5,473	Queen Charlotte Island, tons.....	565
Australian, tons.....	10,944	Vanconver Island, tons.....	7,796
Bellingham Bay, tons.....	11,890	Sitka, tons.....	18
Coos Bay, tons.....	14,238	Mount Diablo, tons.....	60,462
Cumberland, cks.....	2,224	Rocky Mountain, tons.....	918
English, tons.....	2,201	Seattle, tons.....	1,628

The general outlook of the markets for imports, as well as for business in general, is healthful, to say the least. Our wholesale merchants and jobbers in all leading departments of trade make satisfactory reports, not only as regards the volume of trade, but that the general profits are satisfactory quite as much so for the past six months as for the corresponding period the two years previous.

The California Trust Company makes the following yearly report: Surplus June 30th, 1871, $134,976 41; dividends during the year, $47,500; total, $182,476 41; deducting the surplus on hand June 30th, 1870, amounting to $57,918 27, leaves the profits of the year to be $124,558 17.

Nothing has yet been done in the way of grain charters. Liverpool freights nominal at £20 £2 5s.; the surplus tonnage large, with little freight offering in any direction.

The Fireman's Fund Insurance Company disbursed a dividend of 1 percent. per month for the quarter ending June 30th.

Occidental Insurance Company disbursed a dividend of 1½ per cent. per month for the quarter closing June 30th.

The Bank of California declared its customary monthly dividend of 1 per cent., payable on the 15th.

In sales of miscellaneous securities we note that Spring Valley Water Company realized $70@75 50 per share.

Post Office Control of the Telegraph.

The loud complaints which arose against the British Post Office immediately after it had assumed control of the telegraph lines throughout the kingdom, soon died away; and though the transfer was made in the face of the most formidable difficulties, the result has been a complete justification of the undertaking. When the subject arises again in Congress, as it can hardly fail to do, the report of Mr. Scudamore, Second Secretary to the Post Office, will furnish some very forcible arguments for consolidation in this country also. He states that of all the messages handed in at Birmingham, Leeds, Liverpool and Manchester, from 14 to nearly 40 per cent. were at stations previously unsupplied with accommodation; while in London, deliveries which used to take hours are now made within an average of ten minutes. Whereas the telegraph companies had but 1,869 instruments, the Post Office had, last August, 4,153; and whereas the former had but 2,514 clerks—viz., 2,035 males and 479 females—the Post Office employed, in the month just mentioned, 4,913 clerks and assistants, of whom 1,535 were females. Many of the women clerks were secured by recalling those who had been discharged on marriage by the telegraph companies. Of this class as a whole, it is said (we quote directly from the Times): The women clerks have the essential qualifications of quickness of eye and ear, and delicacy of touch, are more patient than men during long confinement to one place, and take more kindly to sedentary employment; that the wages which will draw men from but an inferior class will draw women from a superior class, and hence they will generally write better than the former and spell more correctly; and that they are less disposed than men to combine for the purpose of extorting higher wages. Where the staff is mixed, the female clerks raise the tone of the whole staff. Civil servants expect their remuneration to increase with their years of service, even though from the nature of their employment they can be of no more use or value in the twentieth than in the fifth year of service, but women will retire for the purpose of getting married as soon as they have the chance, and only those will return to the service whose married life is less fortunate than they hoped. Mr. Scudamore concludes that if we place an equal number of females and males on the same scale of pay, the aggregate pay to the females will be less than that to the males; and there will be fewer females than males on the pension list.

— Miss Bertha Tozier, of Athens, Maine, is one hundred and seven years old, and lively.—Exchange. [Here's a rum go! An old maid of one hundred and seven. Mother of Eve! what a nice girl for a small and early tea! And this juiceless old cadaver is "lively;" this gnarled and knotted trunk has the audacity to put forth a green leaf; this dusty old highway dares to meander like a gravel walk! By Jove! it's mean of her. Why, confound her old corporation, she is legally and morally dead and damned—buried, rotted, taken up by the roots of green weeds, and drunk in herb tea by old maids of less than half her years! Now we will wager the profits of our newest swindle that that hag thinks of marrying—that she lies awake nights and wants to as hard as ever she can. Well, well, well; one hundred and seven years old and "lively!" Reader, let us go poison. Yes, thank you; some sugar, and just a dash of Stoughton. "Lively!" Great Scott!]

— An advertisement, to which we are willing to call attention gratis, states that persons desirous of joining the Order of the Seven Wise Men can address the Supreme Ephor, who acts "under the broad warrant of the Most Eminent Supreme Arclun." The Town Crier desires to join, and addresses the Supreme Whatisit thus: DEAR ELPH:—I am of good moral reputation (being but little known) and want to be a Seven Wise Man—a Heptasoph. Your advertisement says your Order is "Oriental;" I want to know if that is anything bad. Likewise, that it is "beautiful;" is it mostly male or female? Moreover, "high in principle;" is it higher than the Jack? Finally, that it is "free from all objection;" how does it happen that you are in it?

— From the annual statement of the Pacific Insurance Company we learn that their assets foot up $1,845,322, being $105,256 more than the previous year. Dividends at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month, equal to $150,000, have been disbursed during the fiscal year. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Jonathan Hunt; Vice-President, A. J. Ralston; Secretary, Charles A. Laton; Marine Secretary, A. Baird; Attorney, S. M. Wilson.

— It is now explained that Dr. Bars'ow, who shot himself in the pate and didn't die, had not the remotest intention of committing suicide. Not he—he only had the dyspepsia, and of course temporary aberration, etc. This is the unanimous opinion of his physicians, and he is beginning to believe it himself. Not wishing to appear obstinate, we believe it.

— Miners' wages at Ottawa, New Zealand, is $2 50 per day.

The Weird Sisters.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.—LAURA D., a Murderess; SUSAN B., a Manikin; ELIZABETH C., an Idiotess; EMILY P., a Noodle. SCENE: A Jail.

LAURA D. (Sings).— Now knells the midnight clock the death of day,
And on the solis-ana stroke another's born:
This is the hour when ghosts are wont to walk,
With pallid aspect paling all the dark—
Freezing the souls of sinners. How is this?
Unwonted tremors seize my totter frame,
Dun darkness settles on my clouding eyes—
Where are my drops? I think it is a spell. [Enter Susan B.]
O, God! I've seen the ghost of Gethsemane,
Come hot from hell, with drawn and crinkled skin;
And face to face I've met the ugly sprite
Of Colonel F—r, with bullet-shattered head;
I've sat for hours and watched the wretched
Of dimpling aziness flange the front
Of my attorney, Oleander Squint;
But never saw I aught that could compare,
In hideous deformity of face,
With this. Speak, spectre, and declare thy name,
If name thy mother lived, or father dared,
To give thee—if, perchance, thou parents had—
Sublime Absurdity, thy title read!

SUSAN B.— Fear not, sweet convert to our simple faith,
I'm but a tender virgin come to speak
Words of great comfort to thy woman's heart.
The cause progresses: only yester night
A woman set upon her tyrant lord
And chopped him into shaw-wood; and anon,
Out of her aged father's wrinkled brow,
With iron spoon a maiden scooped the eyes;
Then afterward a mother brained her boy
With wooden cart-rung—

LAURA D.— What have I to do
With childish recreations such as these?
You call these Woman's Rights—I want them not,
I deal in Woman's wrongs—my simple tastes
Are satisfied with here and there a wife
Made worse than widow, and made widow, too—
Doomed for long years to nurse a broken heart
And slunk at last in a dishonored grave.
This, and some trifling sport with beggared babes,
Comprise the measure of my simple joys.
Whate'er male blood doth flow from fun like this
Is merely incidental to my plan.

[Enter Elizabeth C.]

ELIZABETH C.— Hail sister of the Sisters Three!
Glad tidings bring I unto thee,
Of "Marriage and Maternity."

LAURA D.— I know no marriage such as this you preach,
But such as that you practice. For I teach
That other is but harlotry. I hold
Him as my husband who can give me gold.

[Enter Emily P.]

EMILY P.— Ladies, good morning; I've a bit of news
(Your pardon, Laura, "noose" was not the word):
This way the devil takes a midnight cruise,
And is to be admitted, as I've heard.
I know not what his mission may be here,
Unless he comes to me with a new tale
(You know he's writing for the Pioneer)
An naturally seeks me at the jail.
But since His Sooty Highness is from hell come,
Like daughters good let's give him gracious welcome.

[They join hands.]

ALL (Singing).— Joy to the mortals that bow at the shrine
Of evil immortal—the Devil divine:
Christ and Morality into the night,
Flying before us, shall vanish from sight.
Different methods of wickedness we
Perfectly practice, but here we agree:
Here where the bolts, bars and shackles surround,
Sisterly meet we upon common ground.
By divers roads to damned abodes—

Sometimes slower, sometimes faster—
 All shall meet the mighty master.
 Shameful, shameless, who shall shame us?
T. Diabolum laudamus!

[Satan jumps into the center of the circle in a flame of fire, and kisses them all round. He then produces from under his wing a bucket of pitch, and tars them all with the same brush. There is an earthquake and all disappear; but against the lurid East is seen the black shadow of four gibbets, and a voice is heard singing:

Judgment is ratified,
 Justice is satisfied,
 Heaven is gratified,
 Angels rejoice!

Heligoland.

A correspondent writes: "I see the Heligoland question has turned up again, and a few words of description may not be without interest to your readers, for there is no place like it on the face of the earth. It is a tall red hill, rising straight out of the waters, with a sand-bank on one side. On the sand, and part of the way up the hill, is the town, or rather village. It was inhabited in former times by pilots and wreckers, but now they have degenerated into lodging-house keepers. Heligoland is the Margate of Hamburg. Thither stream the citizens of that rich city to gamble at rouge-et-noir (at least they did when I was there), and to enjoy sea bathing. There is a regular season in the summer months, and sometimes many passengers that are brought in the steamer are obliged to sleep on board, and go back again—the island being full. Every house probably takes in lodgers; but then there are not many houses. The bathers resort to a neighboring sandbank, a sister island, which the governor, it will be remembered, some time ago stocked with rabbits, which began eating up the grass that held the sandbank together, so that the Heligolanders became furious and talked of shaking off the English yoke. However, the rabbits were all shot, and the islanders were pacified, and nothing more was said about their old Frisian Constitution. Their language is German, but they detest that nation even more than they do ourselves. They are not English, though they are English subjects; they are not German, though they speak German. They are Heligolanders, the noblest of created beings; all foreigners are skit, which in their homely dialect means dirt. The top of the island hill is flat, and, as well as I can remember, about the size of the Green Park. There is a well-known story of a man from the Far West—and therefore accustomed to see land only on a large scale—who paid a visit to England. When asked how he enjoyed himself, he replied very much, only he never went out at night for fear of falling off. In Heligoland there is really a danger of such an accident happening to any one who from the force of habit should continue to walk too long in any one direction."—Pall Mall Gazette.

—The present inflation of the California mine market in London is working a permanent injury to our most important interest. There is an organized, and so far successful, attempt to thrust worthless stocks upon British capitalists, and to decry really sound and safe ones. We have had our intelligent eye upon this clever swindle for some time, and have prepared a correct list of both classes of stocks, and we purpose making an exposé presently that shall put this bulling movement in a most unenviable light indeed. The crafty and unscrupulous parties concerned in this wildcatting will come into sudden notoriety at no distant day.

—Some Kentucky women went to the cottage of one Dennis, and snaking him all naked from his bed did carefully pound him with clubs until his pliability was as that of a boned eel. For Dennis had licked his wife. Now, therefore, doth Dennis feelingly inquire: "If a man may not punish his own wife, to whom is the poor woman to look for punishment?" Dennis, we give it up. It is a wicked, wicked world.

—The editor of a city paper says there is now hope that the long desired ship canal "may be able to be cut" across the Isthmus. We learn that it is making superhuman efforts, and the present danger is that in trying to be cut it will so exhaust itself that it will be of no use. An exhausted canal is as useless as an exhausted reservoir, or an empty editor.

—A wild cat was killed in the streets of Los Angeles a few days since.—Exchange. [That is nothing; the streets of Oakland swarm with all the larger kinds of game, and one cannot shuffle along the sidewalks without upsetting a score of prairie dogs and nut-eating squirrels. Moreover, you are tolerably certain to step on a University Cadet.

The New York Riot.

Three or four hundred killed and wounded is a tolerably low price to pay for the privilege of trampling upon law and order in America, and we do not think those who have purchased the same luxury in the marts of the old world need grumble at our rates. If it is objected that we have refused credit and demanded payment on the spot, the low figure at which we have marked our wares must be considered in palliation. In Dublin, London, Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg or Madrid, such a demonstration as that made against the Orangemen would have cost some thousands of lives and some very long terms of imprisonment. So, upon the whole, the Hibernalians may congratulate themselves upon having driven a very good bargain, albeit one which they will feel no disposition to repeat in the future. As for the Orangemen they may hereafter celebrate the battle of Boyne with additional absurdities, zest and zeal. The occurrence has been an instructive as well as a destructive one. It has taught us as well how to make a good Irishman as punish a bad one. The Police of New York, which is composed—as is the Police of most other American cities—principally of Irishmen, did most faithful service in quelling this mob of their own countrymen. It is probable that nine-tenths of the rioters, had they been employed upon the Police, would have been as zealous in suppressing as they were in fomenting the disturbance; and had they belonged to the soldiery would have acted just as the militia did. We may learn from this how to make a good citizen of the average Irishman: give him a permanent place in the local government of the city where he may chance to reside, pay him a good salary and he will kindly abstain from cutting your throat, and assist you to cut that of his unemployed—and, therefore, bloodthirsty—countryman. Place him where he receives no permanent compensation and he becomes merely a gaudy and expensive idleness; to purchase the good behavior of the average Irish immigrant you must proffer something more substantial than a suit of spangled soldier clothes and a right to vote. It is well that this riot occurred; it has not only taught the foreign element of our population that we will maintain against them the rights of American citizens and the dignity of American institutions, but it has so taught ourselves. The revelation of our own unsuspected manhood is the most pleasing feature of the business. Our boasted toleration is so apt to degenerate into mere passivity, and the liberty we accord to all is so likely to become license in the few—a license that we suffer to go unchecked—that any occurrence which brings out the real purpose and meaning of our system, and the forgotten dignity of the American character, is wholesome and desirable. For all past time we have been idly boasting that we offer an asylum to the world's oppressed, and practically inviting them to come and oppress us. If this goes on for a few decades longer, some nation may do a Christian duty and supply an existing want by offering a refuge to Americans. We hope that henceforward our immigrants will be made to understand that it is themselves we want, not their dirty baggage of political and religious animosities.

—The Californian Democrats have joined in the "new departure." They accept the three amendments to the Constitution as a final settlement of the matters with which they deal, but demand the strict construction of them; call for universal amnesty; denounce "unlawful combinations" and also the "bayonet bill" passed to suppress them; declare for a tariff for revenue only, and reprobate the protective system; condemn land grants to corporations; abuse Congress for not repealing the income tax, for maintaining so many tax-gatherers, and for not stopping the importation of Chinese; denounce subsidies to railroads and other corporations; call for the amendment of the State constitutions for various purposes, but notably to prohibit the lending of the State credit to corporations; express warm sympathy with the workingman, and point to legislation shortening the hours of labor and restricting Chinese immigration in proof of their sincerity; again denounce Chinamen as an "inferior people," and abuse Congress for connivance at their coming. The Nation.

—A Boston paper thinks the Coolie traffic should be suppressed "by the united action of all Christendom." So far as we have observed, that is not the way in which all Christendom is accustomed to act.

—A daily newspaper, the Morning Ray, has just perished in New York. In this city the Morning Rag is a flourishing and influential sheet. By this we mean to compliment no less than three separate journals.

—The following is a conundrum: Does that side-whiskered man of destiny, R. Guy Metcalf, expect to make the effete dynasties of Europe feel insulted by shaking the coat-tails of his face at them?

Our European Reflex.

The Ballot bill has passed the English House of Commons. The Lords may somewhat modify it in its passage through their conservative hands, but the fiat has gone forth, and henceforth the system in force in the United States will be adopted at the English elections. After all the change cannot be looked upon as a revolution, for we all know how little secrecy there is in our voting, and the Englishman will follow his leader or his inclination just as he does to-day. It will tend in one sense to encourage knavery, for the dishonest will sell their votes and then deposit their ballot for the other side. In America, party spirit overrides the temptation of the pocket. In England, the lower orders, especially in the agricultural districts, mix little with, and care less for, politics. It doesn't matter to them whether yellow or blue wins, and in many boroughs election day was only regarded as a certain allowance of beef and ale, with a certain amount of hard cash. But the followers and opponents of the Prime Minister were astonished by his declaration that it will become expedient to provide for a new distribution of parliamentary seats, and a readjustment of borough boundaries. What a Reform Bill treading on the heels of the ballot! The Pope has had his jubilee all over Europe, and simultaneous with the event was the entrance of the Italian Government into Rome, thereby restoring it to the title de facto of Capital of Italy. Any one passing through Italy and communing with the people cannot fail to be struck with the calm, determined attitude of the nation to preserve its temporal integrity. It will no more permit French occupation, nor active hostility by Papal troops. No future President or King of France, however ultramontane his tendencies may be, will dare to enter Italy with an army to restore the temporal power of the Pope. The Italian Government is strengthening itself with a treaty offensive and defensive, just concluded with Germany, and cemented with one of those great undertakings which seems to have adopted Italy as their expression, namely, the construction of a direct line of railroad to Germany, with a tunnel which rivals that of Mont Cenis in magnitude. Nice and Piedmont begin to cast longing eyes back to their mother land, now that taxation is beginning to press heavily upon them. The idea of the Pope taking refuge in France was too preposterous to gain much credence. He is too comfortable in Italy, where he still reigns as acknowledged Spiritual Pontiff, ever to leave the Eternal City. He holds Court as ever, and bends his magnificent gazelle-like eyes with their kind though mournful expression on the crowd of the faithful who still offer him homage. For indeed, to those who cling to the Papacy there is much to be proud of in these twenty-five years that Pío Nono has worn the tiara. The meeting of the Vatican Council; the promulgation of the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception, and the Infallibility of the Pope; the gorgeous gathering of Bishops and Prelates at the Centenary of St. Peter; the almost total appointment of the existing college of Cardinals by his Holiness, are of themselves enough to render a Pontiff's reign illustrious. By a strange coincidence, the day of the Papal jubilee was the day of the solemn entrance of the army of Protestant Frederick William, Emperor of Germany, into Berlin. Still, with all their enthusiasm, the good Berliners don't forget the cost of war, and with their address of congratulation to the Emperor, they present a petition that, as Germany had proved herself to be foremost in the arts of war, she would strive to be foremost in the arts of peace. Such action was necessary, because after a successful war there always remains a military caste, who, from the nature of things, delight in battles, and are ever on the look out for new lands to conquer. It is very well for the optimists to say that Germany does not rejoice in the brilliant achievements of her children, or in her acquisition of territory, or in united Germany, as in the guarantee afforded her of being unmolested for a long series of years. France is ostensibly quiet. The first installment of the German indemnity is paid. The general desire is to free the country from foreign troops. Two thousand five hundred women of the Commune, it is said, are to be sent to New Caledonia. We rather doubt the truth of this intelligence, but should it be true, the better portion of them will find their way to New Zealand. The Paris gardens are again open to the public, and Paris gardens are great peace makers to that light-hearted population. Still the places of public amusement have to close at midnight, and the influx of strangers is not yet as in days of yore. Gambetta ready, but not present, and the Bank of France stronger than ever in its wise and prudent conduct during the war and after the conclusion of peace. The course of that great institution during the difficult crisis through which it has passed will be marked in future ages as one worthy of all praise, and a study for those possessing the fiduciary interests of a great nation.

The Rose of Kenmare.

A SONG BY SHIEL DHUV.

I've been soft in a small way
 On the green of Galway,
 And the Limerick lassies have made me feel quare;
 But there's no use denyin'
 No girl I've set eye on Could compare wid Rose Ryan of the town of Kenmare.

CHORUS.

O, where can her like be found?
 Nowhere the country round,
 Spins at her wheel
 Daughter as thrue,
 Sets in the reel
 Wide a slide of the shoe,
 A slinderer, tinderer, wittier, purtier colleen than you, Rose, aroo!

Her hair mocks the sunshine,
 Neck and arm of the colleen completely eclipse;
 Whillet the nose of the jewel
 Slants straight as Carn Tual,
 From the heaven in her eye to her heather-swate lips.
 O, where, etc.

Did your eyes ever follow
 The wings of the swallow
 Here and there, light as air, o'er the meadowfield glance,
 For if not ye've no notion
 Of the exquisite motion
 Of her swate little feet as they dart in the dance.
 O, where, etc.

If y' enquire why the nightingale
 Still shuns the invitin' gale
 That wafts every song-bird but her to the wesht,
 Faix, she knows, I suppose,
 Ould Kenmare has a Rose.

That would sing anny Bulbul to sleep in her nesht,
 O, where, etc.

When her voice gives the warnin'
 For the milkin in the mornin'
 Ev'n the cow known for hornin' comes runnin' to her pail;
 The lambs play about her
 And the small bonneens snout her,
 Whilest their parints salute her wid a twist of the tail.
 O, where, etc.

Whin at noon from our labor
 We draw neighbor wid neighbor
 From the heat of the sun to the shilther of the tree,
 Wid spuds' fresh from the bilin'
 And new milk you come smilin',
 All the boys' hearts beguillin', alannah machree!
 O, where, etc.

But there's one swate hour
 Whin the hot day is o'er
 And we rest at the door wid the bright moon above,
 And she sitting in the middle,
 Whin she's guessed Larry's riddle,
 Cries, "Now for your fiddle, Shiel Dhuv, Shiel Dhuv."
 O, where, etc.

Stock Review.

The mining share market has been characterized by a fair amount of business during the past week, a very large number of companies having participated in the operations, and as a general thing shares have appreciated in value over opening rates for the week. HALE & NORRIS shows an advance under considerable sale. For the week closing July 8th, 624 tons of ore were extracted. SAVAGE was rather dull of sale at uniform rates. They took out 1,133 tons of ore during the week ending July 8th, showing an assay value of $29.08 per ton. KENTUCK shows a bullion yield of $21,700 for June. CROWN POINT is quiet. For the week closing July 9th, 1,965½ tons of ore were extracted, showing an estimated value of $45,130. CALEDONIA, bullion yield in June, $33,650. RAYMOND & ELY, bullion returns for June, $65,000. MEADOW VALLEY, bullion returns in June, $157,000. SUCCESS shows a bullion yield of $11,900. CHOLLAR-POTOSI has been exceedingly active during the past week, under a slight advance. During the year they reduced 83,775 tons of ore, at an expense of $4.58 per ton for extracting, and $12.11 for reduction, showing a total expense of $16.69 per ton. The average yield was $41.30 per ton, which gives a net yield of $24.61 per ton.

Prudence on Women and Politics.

DEAR NEWS LETTER: I long since became so disgusted with this everlasting prating about women's rights, and women's wrongs, and women's suffrage, that I resolved never voluntarily to listen to one of the lectures of these shriekers, either public or private. But with the instinctive curiosity of a woman, I could not resist the temptation of going to hear Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony hold forth as the champion, pioneer Caudiers in the cause, and more especially as I wished to hear the secret of the "new departure" unfolded! I imagined all sorts of new developments would be made, but to my great disappointment it was the old story over again, save this feature—that in future they will force their way to the polls, register their names, if possible, and vote in spite of breaking the laws of the land; and in case of opposition make a hand to hand fight! The arrest and courtling process to follow is what will particularly please them, for who ever saw a woman that did not like to be courted? Now, I fancy, from Miss Anthony's sharp cut, hard, heartless appearance, and the vein of animosity she indulges in toward the opposite sex, she has never been indulged in this essential to a woman's happiness, and "that is what the matter is," and she must in self-defense seek her revenge in this way. She contrasts strongly in personel with Mrs. Stanton, whose matronly appearance, benevolent, jolly countenance is much more pleasing, showing she has not altogether neglected her duties in the more admirable and suitable sphere of woman in her own family and home. It seems the Democratic party is to be "the refuge and salvation" in the final contest of this question, and that they take sweet counsel together. Consequently, this "new departure" is one of a series of moves, and others will follow suit in due time. I have no doubt they will imitate Pat, and vote early and often, and be famous colonizers, and have their private drinking saloons, where milk and ginger pop is retailed to strengthen their efforts! I could see no particular necessity in these lecturers dragging in Mrs. Fair's case in the meddlesome manner they did, and the allusion to it in Miss Anthony's lecture received a just rebuke in the prolonged hissing of the audience. And the ideas of Mrs. Stanton, that Mrs. Fair should be tried by a jury of her peers before final judgment is taken! Peers in what respect? Heaven help us if we have her peers in any respect among us! A jury composed of women like Mrs. Pitts Stevens, the editress of the Pioneer, would, if called upon to judge of the guilt or innocence of the criminal, have consigned her to the bottomless pit long since, for, as a general rule, they are not inclined to be charitably disposed towards the faults and failings of their sex. I should pray to be delivered from a trial before a woman jury! In politics a startling rumor is afloat, that the railroad folks have been playing a Machiavellian game, illustrating the fact how "a wheel within a wheel" will work once in awhile. It is said by those well posted in these matters (the knowing ones) that the railroad people were not sincere in their pretended advocacy of Selby, and that it was through their active influence that he made a backward fight. Shrewd politicians are now of the opinion that had he come forward four weeks sooner he would have certainly beaten Booth and got the nomination. The railroad programme, according to these political sharps, was to keep Selby back until it was too late for him to win before the Convention, and then play Collector Phelps for the Gubernatorial nomination. But this is not all, nor by any means the most astounding part of the game. Phelps was to be put up as the easiest man to be beaten, the railroaders having made things all right with Haight, and desiring to have the weakest Republican candidate pitted against him. They knew that Selby would be strong, and Booth scarcely less so. They also knew that Phelps was about the weakest Republican candidate there could be named. Booth's unexpected development of strength in the interior spoiled this startling and interesting programme. I give this simply as the talk of those who are regarded the shrewdest of the inside wire-workers, and for myself, can scarcely believe it, it seems so preposterous.

PRUDENCE.

— Mrs. Cady Stanton is led to believe that war between civilized nations is pretty nearly at an end. She thinks this because Great Britain and the United States have settled a difference by treaty and arbitration. Half the editors in the land have been preaching the same sermon from the same text, but we did not expect it from a man of Mrs. Stanton's good sense. We hope it may not be regarded impertinent to—not inform but—remind these estimable people that international disagreements have been settled by treaty upon several former occasions, and also that good humans like themselves have been predicting the speedy termination of war ever since the blessed science of prophecy was known among men. And yet, of all years in the history of the world, the last has been the bloodiest year; of all decades, the last has been the bloodiest decade, and of all centuries, the last has been the bloodiest century. Christianity, the religion of peace and brotherly love, is also somewhat more widely professed than at any former period; and by a singular and most exasperating coincidence, nearly all the slaughtering is done among and by the most Christian nations. How do we explain this? We do not explain it; we refer you to His Reverence Archbishop Alemany, and His Rival Reverence Bishop Kip.

— Hall's Journal of Health says: "The old and young delight in warmth; it is to them the greatest blessing." It is a luxury that most of them will obtain dog cheap in the next world.

A Scene in the African Diamond Grounds.

By accounts received from the Diamond Fields of South Africa, we gather how very different these new "Tom Tiddler's grounds" are from the ideal generally in favor. Most people probably form their conception of such a scene from Simbad's "Valley of Jewels," where the Arab mariner made a splendid haul by throwing legs of mutton into the dark ravine, from which the eagles and vultures brought them up again, stuck as full of precious brilliants as a Christmas pudding is of plums. The Vaal diamond diggings are low, dry, barren, ugly slopes, covered with thorn bushes, and sloping down to a wild, naked river. Yet here, for thousands of years, have been lying gems of the finest water, destined at last to glitter on the bosom of beauty and in the diadems of sovereigns. The fascinating stones are found in a yellow-tinted gravel covering the top of the slope; and diamonds seem to keep good company, even when undiscovered, for this very gravel consists largely of quartzes, corneolians, and broken jasper, which would tempt collection were it not that one good brilliant is worth a cart-load of such stones. The digger shovels into a large-meshed sieve as much as is convenient of the gravel, rejecting all the bigger fragments, and sifts the heap through into a pan, which is taken down to the stream. Here he washes the "lot" through two other sieves of decreasing calibre, and, after glancing at the coarser stuff, looks more carefully among the final dishful. Sometimes—not often—the gleam of a diamond repays his toil, but many go on week after week without the longed-for "flash," and the labor, although not severe, is dreadfully monotonous. Does it pay? Perhaps there is no form of plodding industry that more nearly approaches to gambling, whether in its motives or in the aggregate and average gain on the labor bestowed. Telegraph.

—The sentimental impracticables of both sexes—the old maids of vinegar aspect, with untold wealth of enforced virtue, equally with the bald-headed iniquitors who nightly sup full of all current vice; the tender virgin who knows not to be other; the sober-eyed dame, jealous of her husband's fair fame and careless of her own; the downy-faced young male with a talent for Sunday-school psalmody and a weakness for poker dice. Pat families whose stories at the club, if printed and carried in the pocket, would subject the bearer to arrest; the good parson upon whom the ewes of his flock bestow countless flannel wraps for his dear "rheumatism"—all these, and all their moral kith and kin, are piously shocked and grieved at a proposition of Dr. Holland to take the Social Evil by the horns, instead of covertly assailing it at the hoof with the milk-teeth of pinching poodles, or baying it from afar with the clamor of tethered hounds. These are they who clutch tight the nose against the stinks of society, and swear that all is lavender and sweet clover. According to them, there's not an ill in life, but naming it makes it so." And that canting Chadband, the Bulletin, must needs egg on this opposition to common sense, like the pious pander that it is to such poor pseudo-morality as it can comprehend. The Call, too, hearing the Bulletin growl, yelps in the minor key as a champion of threatened respectability. It matters not that the plan Dr. Holland proposes is undeniably beneficial wherever it has been tried; that it tethers vice and tethers disease; it is enough that its execution requires a seeming parley with the sin that our present system defies and encourages, ignores and abets. If we cannot defeat our enemy without recognizing him as a belligerent, let us submit to be ourselves defeated. So shall we preserve our blessed hypocrisy to the last, and while fleeing with corruption and dead men's bones, we shall point proudly to our whitened exterior, whose facade is carved with Scripture texts from base to dome.

—A placid simpleton who calls himself "Ignotus Magnus," and whose peculiar affliction it is to be wildly paragraphic in Sunday's Alta, says that when the journalistic blackguards of Oregon have killed one another off there will be a chance for the dunces. There seems to be a chance in this city for at least one dunce—the same which it is himself. His chance here, however, is a merely ephemeral one, and he would better make himself to Oregon with all convenient dispatch. Within the past three years we have cheerfully contemplated the rise and fall of some dozens of better imitators of the Town Crier than "Ignotus" is. They "cometh up as a flower" on every side, and for some weeks the dailies are merry with their foolery, but in the end it happens unto them that they rupture a blood vessel, and then they die as die the early righteous. Thus it shall be with this lordly weakling, who fain would fright us with his stride and voice; but we know that the one is as but the martial strut of a boned turkey, and the other as the clamor of an aged hen mistaking the cast-iron door knob upon which she has casually sat down, for an egg of her own. It is as impossible for a dullard to maintain the attitude of a wit, as it is for the long, white and sickly shoot of a collared potato to stand vertical. The Alta's last and most limpid intellectual jelly-fish will probably beach himself high and dry in about another week.

—The records of Messrs. Hope, McKillop & Co. show the following Deeds, Mortgages and Releases for the week ending July 13th: Deeds, 98; value, $239,592. Mortgages, 61; value, $434,100. Releases, 42; value, $346,194.

Nicolas Halpine, son of "Miles O'Reilly," has been admitted to the Naval Academy at Annapolis.—Platt's Hall was literally crammed on the occasion of Mrs. Cady Stanton's lecture on "The New Republic."—Americans are striving in Paris for Communist prisoners, offering them employment in different portions of the Union, and in Lower California.—Governor Randolph issued a proclamation permitting the Orangemen's procession in New Jersey.—A farmer in Ohio, while demonstrating with a pistol the manner of Vallandigham's accidental death, terminated his own life in precisely the same manner.—A Chinaman in Court, whose knowledge of his mother tongue was imperfect, but who speaks Spanish fluently. He has been many years in Havana.—An indignant Anti-Woman Suffrage man prevented his wife's entrance into Platt's Hall, last night, with some violence, throwing her down and swearing at her.—The Reno extension of the railroad is progressing.—Stamps for lager beer barrels average 40,000 a day—double that of last year.—When General Cavado was taken prisoner it was rumored that the authorities promised to spare his life if he would discourage his co-revolutionists. He has left letters to relatives and others, counseling the abandonment of the cause, but he was executed.—Governor Hoffman, of New York, revoked the order of Chief of Police Kelso prohibiting the Orangemen's procession. The Catholic element, predisposed for a free fight, commenced rioting before any signs of the procession appeared. The excitability of Irish blood, amounting at times to positive insanity, having thus inaugurated bloodshed, who can say when it will stop?—The Bulletin suggests the circulation of some of Drake DeKay's captivating descriptions of Lower California be perused by the proposed Communist emigrants.—Denny Sullivan inaugurated a small riot by—without warning—striking and knocking down officer Englander—perhaps on account of his name.—Albert Shopensky, who shot himself, died in the County Hospital.—John Morrissey will allow no women to gamble in his house. They are not so particular in the restriction of women's rights in Germany.—The Orangemen of this city showed a considerate thoughtfulness in not parading yesterday. To their credit be it noted that they let the Pontifical celebration pass off quietly.—Fifteen carts and thirty-seven men set to cleaning our streets—not before it was wanted.—The Pioneer and St. George Cricket Clubs will play a match at the Recreation Grounds on Saturday.—Street opinions of the New York rioting is generally severely condemnatory of the lawlessness of the Irish Catholics. Such acts tend to the resurrection of the American party.—The figures of Mr. Lowe show that while total taxation and rates in England vary from $12 to $15 per capita, having decreased from 18 to 20 per cent. in 45 years, in Boston it amounts to $30, and in New York to nearly the same.—Capt. Hughes, a veteran of the late civil war, proceeds to Amador to relieve Capt. Woodhams, of the Sumner Guard.—A brute in Stockton, of Quim-like proclivities, less the butchering propensities, is threatened with hempen strangulation.—Ed. Curtis will lecture next Sunday.—A beet sugar factory is suggested at San Buenaventura.—Thiers' letter to the Pope is declared by Favre to be apocryphal. It is officially stated to be a forgery.—Schenck and daughters visited the Universities at Oxford.—French Minister of Marine denies the transportation of 1,000 women to Cayenne.—Mrs. Wharton, widow of Major Wharton, U. S. A., is charged in Baltimore with double murder in poisoning General Wm. T. Ketchum and Eugene Van Ness, a book-keeper.—Susan B. Anthony lectured on "The Power of the Ballot" to a large audience. She did not create so favorable an impression as Mrs. Stanton.—Twenty-five farm laborers have been engaged for a term, to be brought from Scotland, through Messrs. Vale & Warner.—French and German are to be taught at the Hayes Valley and Valencia-street Schools.—W. B. Cranna has commenced an action for libel against J. P. Bogardus, of the Figaro; damages laid at $20,000.—An old gentleman committed suicide on a Mississippi steamboat by the Japanese method, hari kari.—Lady advertisements for an accomplished poodle nurse.—Louis Napoleon gets 2,000 letters a week from France. The Chislehurst Post Office has to be enlarged.—Switzerland is hard up, and wants a loan.—Brick Pomeroy calls the death of Vallandigham a special Providence.—Pension Agent Lawrence's defalcation is $50,000.—Miss Hattie Cole, the squirming of a snake in whose stomach can be distinctly seen, is at Buckingham, Pa. She is only ten years old.—John Gahn, at Scranton, Penn., while intoxicated, jumped upon a locomotive and started it. He brought up in a ditch, the engine wreck, but he was not killed.—In New York, the opponents of the Orangemen cut the telegraph wires and appropriated the street cars. The military and police were insufficient to prevent the riot. They attacked the procession; many of them were clubbed by the police and taken prisoners. At Twenty-sixth street, the Ninth Regiment charged upon the mob with fixed bayonets, and several were killed, and one woman wounded. Col. Jim Fisk was shot through the ankle, and Lieut. Page mortally wounded. The Sixth, Ninth and Eighty-fourth fired on a house from which an attack was made, the last named regiment, it is said, firing without orders. The sidewalk was swept, and the officers rushed into the ranks to stop the firing. This volley quelled the riot, and the most desperate of the rioters could not be induced to resume the fight. The procession then proceeded without further interruption. About forty have been killed and wounded.—George Francis Train has gone to Paris to reestablish Communism or perish in the attempt.—The mechanics and laborers of Valjeo called a meeting to consider the reduction of wages in the Navy Yard, where they talk of resisting in their might such reduction.—The detailed account by Sergeant Mott of the conflict between the Apaches and the United States troops, when Lieut. Cushing was killed, is thrilling.—The Common Council of New York had a meeting, and endorsed the action of Governor Hoffman in permitting the Orange procession.—Ferre, a leading Communist, has been taken.—Joseph Johnson, engineer of the distillery at Antioch, was found dead in striking at a bare with the butt of his gun. It was discharged, shooting him in the bowels.—The exciting riot in New York has led to the circulation of a proposal for the formation of a Protestant League of America, on the ground that the claims of Roman Catholics are incompatible with civilization and religious liberty.—The locality of the house to which Col. Flisk was taken after being wounded was kept a secret, as the mob threatened to take his life if they could find him.—A large force is to be put on at Mare Island. So says the telegraph.—The New York merchants tender "thanks to Governor Hoffman for relieving the Empire City from the odium of being governed by a mob.—Artesian wells are about to be bored in the City Park Reservation, at San Diego, to supply the city with water.—John Hunt, a passenger from San Francisco on the steamer Pacific, fell overboard and was drowned at sea.—Man named Hagan stabbed at Eureka.—Four Chinamen attempted to drown a fellow countryman, but were arrested.—A farmer—an Irishman—named Martin Meara, in Iroquois county, Ill., stripped his son, eleven years of age, and placed him on a hot stove, roasting him terribly on the back; he then flogged him with a snake whip fearfully. He died immediately afterwards. Meara has hitherto been noted for brutal cruelty to animals.—A wedding ring found by a fisherman in the belly of a codfish, some months ago, has been restored to the husband of a lady on whose finger it was when she was drowned by the wreck of the Anglo Saxon, in 1861. It was identified by a monogram, P. B., engraved on it. The gentleman, Mr. Burnam, made the fisherman a present of $250.—Sheriff White has been served with the Supreme Court supercedens restraining him from executing Mrs. Fair.—The Orange demonstrations in Ireland, and also in Canada, passed off quietly.—Judge Selden S. Wright fractured his leg on board the steamer Pacific. This is unfortunate, as the Judge was on the eve of his political campaign.—The Judge of the Municipal Criminal Court declined to excuse a juror because he could not read or write, but had to let up on him because he said he did not understand the high words used in Court.

—To him who knows the Rev. D. D. Chapin, of the Pacific Churchman, merely as a decent Christian, a careful study of that gentleman's character will develop many unsuspected peculiarities. The Rev. D. D. Chapin (who does not happen to be also the Rev. Chapin D. D., because of his inability to convince any Theological institution that he is either a Doctor or a Divinity) is not exactly of holiness all compact, nor of wisdom entirely replete. He may in fact be wickedly likened unto a vicious donkey who has conceived the idea that it is his mission to let fly his heels at all the stonic walls with which he may chance to come in contact, and who accordingly does so, to the unspeakable edification of the wondering cows and admiring porkers, but without material injury to the wall. Or, chancing our simile, we may regard him as a bellicose ram assailing with headlong impetus a pendant grindstone, which returns his sturdy battering not in anger, but in simple obedience to the law of gravitation until the repeated encounters leave nothing of him but a warlike tail, shaking spitefully at its unconscious foe, with lofty scorn but rather ludicrous general effect. Such comparisons as these, however, are odious—to the donkey and the ram—and we will content our soul with simply calling our Reverend subject a Chapin; and, as says Mr. Congress, this we shall continue to call him so long as he shall deserve it, or until our fertile invention can suggest a more dishonoring epithet. Now, Chapin, dear, attend thou strictly to the holy things that appertain unto Episcopal salvation, and deviate not into matters secular. Give thyself up to the sanctimonious shuffle of the religious editor whose meek soul is centered upon the filthy lucre of the faithful. Pitch thine oily voice to the wonted whine of the journalistic beggar pleading for pennies. Lengthen thy visage to the standard wouniness and weep for the damned of thine own flock. But by the good Satan who sitteth in the pit whereupon thy steps take hold, if thou keepest not thy pious impertinence for the jackasses of thine own kind, we shall make it exceedingly merry for thee! Yea, we shall afflict thee with all manner of ill; we shall glut thee with gall and fill thee with a wealth of wormwood. Ha!... The reader will pardon the necessary brevity of this notice; we would say more, but don't know how Fiddle-D.-D. Chapin would take it. Commonly he takes it with sugar and a bit of lemon.

—A correspondent—a lady—would like us to flay Dr. Holland for his course relative to the social evil. It would afford us the utmost pleasure to strip the Doctor's hide from his quivering flesh, as requested; but it so happens that we think as he does regarding this subject, and must beg to be excused. If the lady will favor us with her address we will inveigle the Doctor into her toils, and she may maltreat him to her heart's content, according to the dictates of her own conscience and the promptings of her ingenuity. It would be a refinement of cruelty to kiss him.

The English Communists on Paris.

A manifesto has just been issued, followed by a good many well-known English workmen's signatures, which is, perhaps, the most significant and ominous of the political signs of the times. It bears, amongst others, the signature of George Odger, of B. Lucraft, of Thomas Mottershead, of Cowell Stepney, and of John Hales, and consists of an exceedingly vigorous and virulent defense of the Paris Commune. It is not an apology for the Commune; it is not a plea in extenuation of its violence; it is a thorough-going panegyric upon its aim and its deeds, bestowing, as far as we can apprehend its drift, implicit approval even on its most violent acts, such as the destruction of the great buildings of Paris and the massacre of the innocent hostages. The writing, as vigorous as Cobbett, reminds us of that of earlier documents of the same Association, which have been attributed, we know not how truly, to the pen of the Corresponding Secretary for Germany, Karl Marx. But to whomsoever it may be due, it is a matter of no slight moment for England to find that ideas as violent as these are caught up and acknowledged by men who have taken no inconsiderable part in our recent English politics, who certainly sway the councils of a section, however small, of the workmen's Unions, and who aspire (even though as yet unsuccessfully) to represent the homes and dreams of English labor. Let it be understood that we are expressing no amazement and no regret that these shrewd and vehement men regard the cause of the Paris Commune with far greater favor than the cause of the Versailles Assembly. Nor should we feel either surprise or dismay at any manifesto signed by English workmen, which, after weighing the merits and deserts of the opposite parties in this bloody civil war, should have found much more that was noble in the ideal of the Commune, and much less that was malignant about its actions, than the ordinary looker on. But that would be faint language indeed, to describe the manifesto just put forth by the Council of the International Association, and approved by some of the leaders of the workmen. This manifesto finds but one serious fault with the Commune—that it did not march on Versailles while Versailles was still indefensible. For the rest, it overwhelms the Assembly and its leaders with charges of treachery and infamy, but it ignores wholly the wild suspiciousness, the utter want of reciprocal loyalty and coöperation among the leaders of the Commune; it casts scorn on M. Thiers and his colleagues for their corruptness, but while intimating incidentally that many of the Paris forts were bought by them from the Commune, it forgets to note in this the equal corruptness of many of the Commune's trusted adherents; it denounces massacre in M. Thiers, but approves the retributive massacre of his antagonists; it speaks of its heroes as martyrs to be "enshrined in the great heart of the working class;" and in a word, it justifies the bloody propaganda of the insurrectionary party of labor, just as the Holy Inquisition has justified the bloody propaganda of orthodoxy, or M. Thiers the "pitilessness" of his purpose of enforcing "expiation." It is hardly pleasant to see words like these with the signatures of respectable English working-class leaders at the bottom of them:

"When Thiers, as we have seen, from the beginning of the conflict, enforced the humane practice of shooting down the Communal prisoners, the Commune, to protect their lives, was obliged to resort to the Prussian practice of securing hostages. The lives of the hostages had been forfeited over and over again by the continued shooting of prisoners on the part of the Versailles. How could they be spared any longer after the carnage with which MacMahon's praetorians celebrated their entrance into Paris? Was even the last check upon the unscrupulous ferocity of bourgeois Government—the taking of hostages—to be made a mere sham of? The real murderer of Archbishop Darboy is Thiers."

Even this miserable excuse is taken away by the admitted fact that the hostages were murdered when the struggle was at a close, so that it could not exercise any restraining influence on the conduct of the Versailles Generals, while it could and did enrage the troops into fiercer frenzy. To execute a number of innocent persons as your last administrative act is a curious way of exercising "a check upon the unscrupulous ferocity of bourgeois Government;" it was, indeed, such a "check" as a bottle of pure spirits is to delirium tremens, or the plunge of a spur to a horse that is running away. To our minds, it is a very grave fact that English workmen, however extreme, should be found to speak with enthusiasm of a party which, whatever may have been respectable and defensible in its aims, made light of the unity of France, preferred itself to the nation, and yet was so filled with mutual distrusts, that it could rely on no leader, could never bring more than a small fraction of the people of Paris to support it at the polling-booths, and was forced to find its enthusiasm in a world of ruin and a sea of blood.

The ominous element in this manifesto, considered, that is, as obtaining the adhesion of any real leader of the English working class, is the firm conviction which pervades it throughout that the hands of the working class must be against those of all other classes; that the bourgeoisie of all countries are contemptible and corrupt; that humanity and the Proletariat are convertible terms; that in religion Voltaireanism is the true creed of the working class; that unless the wealthy submit implicitly to be ruled by the poor, and for the apparent good of the poor, a social war is the only means of regeneration. Nor is it even easy to make out clearly what the special objects of the advocates of the Proletariat are. They denounce indeed the high salaries of office, and wish to see Government carried on by those who will accept workmen's wages because they belong to the working class—which seems to be held to be a guarantee for honesty—but beyond this we get no clearer programme of principle than the following:

"The Commune, they [hostile critics] exclaim, intends to abolish property, the basis of all civilization! Yes, gentlemen, the Commune intend to abolish that class-property which makes the labor of the many the wealth of the few. It aimed at the expropriation of the expropriators. It wanted to make individual property a truth by transforming the means of production, land and capital, now chiefly the means of enslaving and exploiting labor, into mere instruments of free and associated labor. But this is Communism, 'impossible' Communism! Why, those members of the ruling classes who are intelligent enough to perceive the impossibility of continuing the present system—and they are many—have become the obtrusive and full-mouthed apostles of coöperative production. If coöperative production is not to remain a sham and a snare; if it is to supersede the capitalist system; if united coöperative societies are to regulate national production upon a common plan, thus taking it under their own control, and putting an end to the constant anarchy and periodical convulsions which are the fatality of capitalist production—what else, gentlemen, would it be but Communism, 'possible' Communism?"

We do not wonder at this dream, and still less do we blame it; but we do wonder that any honest Englishman should regard as the International Association evidently does—all the distrust felt of it as mere selfish fear, the recoil of corrupt luxury before naked right. Why, the dream is as yet hardly concrete enough to be sketched out in the imagination. How are the land and capital to be transferred to the coöperative laborers? By whom is the amount of competition amongst different coöperative societies to be determined? Is the Proletariat to organize itself into a number of Communes, each with the sole right of producing and distributing all possible wealth within its own area? The dream is as yet a chaos which would fill, we should have supposed, even Mr. Odger with dread; and yet the spirit of the pamphlet signed by him, amongst others, is one of fierce and even deadly animosity against all who do not join to preach and teach it as a gospel of the future. Spectator.

In Committee of the Democrats

Mr. McCoppin offered the following resolutions, which were adopted without discussion; Mr. McNeal, Pilot Commissioner, voting no: Resolved, By the Democratic County Committee of San Francisco, First—That we recognize the perfect truth of the proposition recently enunciated, namely: "That the untrammelled exercise of local self-government by the people is the salt which preserves our whole system." Second—That the creation of numerous non-elective Commissions which require a swarm of officers who, in the present depressed condition of things in our city, harass our people and eat out their substance, is, in the opinion of this Committee, inconsistent with the untrammelled exercise of local self-government by the people, and is, therefore, undemocratic and wrong. Third—That this Committee, which, for the time being, is entrusted with the direction of the destinies of the Democratic party in this county, and being anxious for its success, doth explicitly declare that this city ought to be taken out of Commission at the earliest moment practicable, and we hereby call upon the Democracy, first of San Francisco and afterwards of the whole State, to unite with us in the work of abolishing said Commissions and the establishment, upon an economical basis, of a Board of Public Works in lieu thereof. Fourth—That for the purpose of obtaining an expression of opinion upon this subject at the approaching primary election, the people of the respective Wards and Precincts are hereby requested, in making up their tickets for Delegates to the Legislative Convention, to have them so printed that the electors can vote upon this question of Commissions to the end that all candidates for the Legislature shall be pledged in the most direct and unequivocal manner to use their influence, if elected, in favor of repealing the laws creating said Commissions.

— Professor Von Schlegelintweit is rather obviously of German extraction. The Professor has writ a book on California, which is a German book. The German Professor proposes to dedicate his German book to our Academy of Sciences. The Professor is not quite sure the Academicians will like it, and writes them a letter as long as his leg, begging them, with such circumlocution and prolixity as he is master of, to do him the great favor of permitting him to mildly toot their horn. The Academicians, not to be outdone in circumlocution, and conscious of superior prolixity, reply with a wild fantaronnade upon the horn of the Professor, and humbly hope that he will consent to blow the blast which he has asked permission to execute. Modestly admitting our own inferiority in circumlocution, and confessing that we are but young in prolixity, we yet would wish to remark unto the German Professor and the Kamaka Academy, that we esteem them eminently and equally ridiculous, and trust that they will lay us under an everlasting obligation by graciously accepting the assurances of our distinguished consideration.

The Robin.

My old Welsh neighbor over the way,
 Crept slowly out in the sun of spring,
 Pushed from her ears the locks of gray,
 And listened to hear the robin sing.

Her grandson, playing at marbles, stopped,
 And, cruel in sport, as boys will be,
 Tossed a stone at the bird, who hopped
 From bough to bough in the apple tree.

"Nay!" said the grandmother; "have you not heard,
 My poor, bad boy, of the fiery pit,
 And how, drop by drop, this merciful bird
 Carries the water that quenches it?"

"He brings cold dew in his little bill,
 And lets it fall on the souls of sin;
 You can see the mark on his red breast still
 Of fires that scorch as he drops it in.

"My poor Bron rhuddyn! my breast-burned bird,
 Singing so sweetly from limb to limb,
 Very dear to the heart of Our Lord,
 Is he who pities the lost like him!"

"Amen!" I said to the beautiful myth;
 "Sing, bird of God, in my heart as well
 Such good thought is a drop wherewith
 To cool and lessen the fires of hell.

"Prayers of love like rain-drops fall,
 Tears of pity are cooling dew,
 And dear to the heart of Our Lord are all
 Who suffer like him in the good they do!"

The Chinese Dispatch.

Trouble is certainly brewing in China. Our Ministers may be lulled into the sleep of a false security by the peaceful asseverations of Mr. Wade, whose roseate-tinted picture of the Celestials is exciting mingled gratulation and incredulity. But others equally well-informed on affairs in China affirm that matters are hastening on to the goal of a war of extermination against foreigners. The Chinese are becoming bold as the European Powers, which formerly held them in check, are becoming impotent and imperfurbable by events abroad. We offer no prediction as to the future course of events in China; but the Chinese Government has now presented its first ultimatum to the European Powers, and it remains to be seen what development this new phase of the Chinese problem will assume. The mysterious Circular of the Chinese Government, which has been the source of much apprehension, is now before Parliament, and from this it appears that the crusade is first made against the missionaries—chiefly Roman Catholic French—established in China. A more flaming excitement to popular wrath could hardly have been penned. The European missionaries are accused of all imaginable offences, whereby their presence has become odious.—London Globe.

— In the name of humanity we protest shriekingly against the following rule of the revised manual of the Board of Education: "Absence during days held sacred by parents shall be counted as absence for sickness." Now, if Monsieur and Madame Swottletot, who came originally from Boorioboola Gha, choose to excuse their son from school upon the day when the basswood God of their countrymen is said to have sprouted a live-oak tail, why should the youth in question be accounted sick? There is something singularly absurd in regarding the youth as an invalid, when perhaps he is perpetrating countless handsprings and throwing innumerable flipflaps in honor of his ligneous deity.

— A writer in the "Capital" says there is a striking likeness between Lydia Thompson and Laura D. Fair. If these worthy ladies had not long since lost the ability to blush, that statement would cause them to redder mutually about the gills. By the bye, speaking of likenesses, we have detected, in a cast iron dog at Mr. Latham's place on Folsom street, a most wonderful resemblance to Susan B. Anthony. If Susan has time we wish she would step up there and take a look at that dog: it will remind her of home.

— The pious Occident earnestly disclaims having charged the Methodists with the sin of Antinomianism. We are glad to see this large and respectable body of Christians relieved of so terrible and degrading an accusation. If anybody should call us an Antinomianism we should bring an action against him—the action of the extensor muscles in our dexter leg. There have been men killed for calling less opprobrious names than this.

— John Morrissey has published an edict excluding the she sex from his gambling rooms at Saratoga. If it will be soothing to the suffragers we will suppose his excuse was that the presence of woman at the gaming table so "elevated" his male customers that they would not bet. We suppose now that her purifying influence is removed, these dens will become as immoral as the Congress of the United States, or a conclave of church deacons.

THE PONTIFICATE.

Celebration of the 25th Anniversary of the Pope.

HONOR TO PIO NONO, HEAD OF THE CHURCH.

The Pontifical celebration of Sunday, July 2d, was most extraordinary, both in point of number of participants and completeness of arrangement. The whole Roman Catholic population of the city and this comprises a good share of our citizens, entered into the affair with a heart and will which resulted successfully. A purely religious celebration of any size or importance is seldom seen in America—never has there been one which was a tribute to the head of the Great Church, and whose name is venerated even by those whose religious convictions do not permit them to do him reverence. The Church, which is the oldest of all Christian Churches, and whose history is the history of the world, united to do honor to its head, PIO PONO, 25th Pope of Rome, who for five-and-twenty years has sat in St. Peter's chair. The elaborate programme of the procession, where the several divisions formed and the route of march we present in the Mail Bag. Each Church was awarded a division, and the various Benevolent Societies and Associations apportioned among them, and many of them awarded military escorts. Bands of music headed each division and discoursed fine music during the march. Allegorical and triumphal cars, elaborately decorated and filled with beautiful children personating epochs in sacred history formed an important feature in the celebration. From the towns about— from San José, Vallejo, Oakland and a dozen others—came large deputations of believers to add their mite to the grand whole.

DECORATING OF BUILDINGS.

The Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum was decorated, and also the Church of St. Ignatius on Market street. In front of the church was displayed a large portrait of His Holiness, draped with white and yellow, and supported on either side with the American and Pontifical flags. In the evening an electric light, from a battery of sixty-four cups, was displayed in front of the College. A regulator made in Paris, and a powerful Fresnel lens were used. The Mechanics' Pavilion, on Union Square, where the exercises took place, was fitted up and decorated in an elegant and costly manner. The partitions which divided the wings from the main hall were torn down, and the floors which were laid by the Roller Skating Company removed. The interior of the building presented its old familiar appearance, and accommodated many thousand people. Seats were erected in the main hall, with an aisle leading from the front entrance to the platform on the west end of the Pavilion. The three arches which lead into the lobby on the Stockton-street side were decorated with heavy damask hangings, and large blue and white silk tassels. A large cross covered with flowers surmounted the whole. The entrances were hung with flags and banners, and the scene from the street was a very pretty one. The fountain was covered over and shaped into the form of a boat, in which the little girls representing the different States of the Union were seated. The platform was covered with red, white and blue bunting, and directly over it was a representation of the Great Seal of America. Around the balconies the coat-of-arms and mottoes of the different States were hung, and the flags of many nations drooped down from the pillars supporting the balconies, presenting a striking and beautiful appearance.

Pope Pius IX., in honor of whom this celebration took place, was born at Sinigaglia, Italy, on the 13th day of May, 1792. Passing with a single remark his ordination to the Priesthood in 1819; his mission to Chile as Apostolic Vicar, in 1823 his return to Rome and appointment by Leo the XII. to the Presidency of the vast Ospizio of San Micheli, in 1825; his career as Archbishop of Spoleto, commencing two years later, and terminating with his appointment as Bishop of Imola, in 1832, and his subsequent promotion to the Cardinalship in 1840, let us hasten on to that eventful day of June 16th, 1846, when the great and good Pius, at the ripe age of 54 years, was unanimously chosen by the Sacred College of Cardinals as the visible head of the Catholic Church. No language of July can half so well portray the pure gold of our good Pontiff's real character, as do the humble words, which, on the very day of his election, he addressed in a brief note to his brothers, informing them of that event. It reads thus:

"ROME, 16th June,  $\frac{3}{4}$  past 11 P.M.—The blessed God, who humbles and exalts, has been pleased to raise me from insignificance to the most sublime dignity on earth. May His most holy will be ever done. I am sensible, to a certain extent, of the immense weight of such a charge, and I also feel my utter incapacity, not to say the entire nullity of my powers. Cause prayers to be offered, and you also pray for me. The conclave has lasted forty-eight hours. If the city should wish to make any public demonstration on the occasion, I request you will take measures—in deed, I desire it—that the whole sum so destined be applied to purposes which may be judged useful to the city, by the Chief Magistrate and Council. As to yourselves, dear brothers, I embrace you with all my heart in Jesus Christ; and far from exulting, take pity on your brother, who gives you all his Apostolic blessing."

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Pope's election occurred on the 16th of June, 1871, and to celebrate this event, in a manner worthy of the Head of their Church, the Catholics of this city and vicinity combined with the result witnessed on Sunday, July 2d.

That the gentlemen who took the matter of the celebration in hand nobly and faithfully discharged their duties is demonstrated by the result of their labors. For some time past the Catholic people had been most enthusiastic in their desire to participate, and it was not at all unexpected to see them turn out in thousands, either to take active part in the procession or be spectators. At an early hour the streets were thronged with people on their way to different churches, in accordance with instructions, to hear Mass, and then participate in the procession.

The Pontifical High Mass was celebrated at the St. Mary's Cathedral, by Bishop Alemany. The music was given by thirty-five singers and twenty-five instruments. Solos were sung by Mrs. Uhrig, soprano; Mrs. Evans, alto; Mr. Uhrig, bass, and Dr. Belinge, tenor. The offertorium, "Laudate Dominum," by Haydn, was then given; bass solo by Uhrig. A sermon was then delivered by Father Prendegast, after which Beethoven's grand Hallelujah Chorus was sung. The church was profusely and tastefully decorated. After the services fifty Aids from St. Mary's organized its congregation into line, and, preceded by Archbishop Alemany in an open barouche, marched to Kearny street, and took the lead of the procession from the Vallejo-street Church.

Father Gallagher, of St. Bridget's, Father Gray, of St. Patrick's, and Father Buchard of St. Ignatius, also celebrated High Mass in their respective churches, all of which were crowded with an immense number of people.

After Mass at the different churches, the crowds on the streets were everywhere increased; mounted Marshals drove rapidly from place to place, military companies in handsome uniforms marched to the place of rendezvous, while cars, handsomely decorated, containing young ladies robed in white and bearing emblems suited to the occasion, were everywhere to be seen. The societies connected with the different churches formed in front of these churches after Mass, and, joined by members of the congregation, marched under escort of Marshals and to the soul-stirring strains of music to the place of rendezvous, on Fifth street, near Brannan. One o'clock P.M. was the hour appointed for the procession to move, and about twelve o'clock the organizations began to pour in from all directions and take up their respective positions. At the time appointed for starting the scene presented in this vicinity was gorgeous and truly amazing. From Howard street to Brannan on Fifth, and the intervening cross streets, was a waving sea of human beings, while here and there the top of a temporary dome or canopy, gaily decorated and ornamented with pictures or decked with flowers, caught the eye. Further on the bright helmets of the Jackson Dragoons and Haight Light Cavalry shone in the sun, while their uniform contrasted with the handsome regalia of the Grand Marshal and Aids, lent a variety to the scene, at once pleasing and attractive. It was difficult to marshal a procession of such magnitude, and no one expected that it could be done so well as it has been. The Grand Marshal relied more on instruction imparted before hand to his Aids than upon directions on the spot. The result was a success, for although the procession was in a large measure composed of unorganized bodies, the Grand Marshal was able to give the order to march a short time after the appointed hour. At precisely half-past one o'clock his Aids reported the procession ready to move. The order was given and the trumpeters sounded it along the line—

"FORWARD, MARCH."

These words were picked up and reiterated by the thousands who lined the streets, followed by a general rush to keep pace with the forward movement. The advance was composed of a platoon of mounted police, followed by eight mounted trumpeters, after whom came the

FIRST DIVISION

Headed by Allen's band. Marshal A. Harpending rode in advance, with his two Aids, James Daly and J. B. Danos. Then came the Haight Light Cavalry, in as fine trim as we ever remember to have seen them—their arms and accoutrements bright and their horses clean. They showed forty men in rank, and were under the command of Capt. Geo. T. Knox. They were followed by the Jackson Light Dragoons, who looked well, and had thirty-seven men under the command of Captain Greaney. A barouche drawn by four white horses came next, containing the Most Reverend Archbishop Joseph Sadoc Alemany, Right Reverend Bishop O'Connell, of Marysville; Very Reverend James Croke, Vicar General, and Very Reverend F. Villarsa, Provincial of the Dominican Order, Benicia. Next, another barouche containing Hon. Zach. Montgomery, Orator of the Day; Hon. P. H. Burnett, President of the Day; Henry M. McGill, Vice-President, and Charles F. Smyth and Capt. J. Mullin, Secretaries. Twelve carriages followed, containing Reverend Father Gleason, Brother Justin, President of St. Mary's College; Hon. Frank McCoppin; Supervisors Menzies, Kenney, Kelly, Commine, McCarthy and Goodwin, Michael Flood and others. The "Cars of the Centuries" then appeared. They were drawn each by two horses. The sides were draped with yellow and white cloth. In the center of each car longitudinally rose a sort of arch in yellow and white. Upon the white portion of this frame were inscribed in black letters the names of the Popes who reigned in the century which the car represented. We give them as follows, and also the names of the young ladies in each:

First Century.—St. Peter, St. Linus, St. Cletus and St. Clement. Young ladies—Ellen Flynn, Sarah Maharar, Nellie McElroy, Mary Sweeney, Mary Ann Kearney, Helen J. McDermott, Josephine Dillon, Annie and Kate Marsh, Dollie Hughes, Mary Ann Tiernan, Annie Sullivan, Kate Tiernan, Sarah Edgar. (This car had a large painting of Christ delivering the keys to St. Peter.)

Second Century.—St. Evaristus, St. Alexander, St. Sixtus I., St. Telesphorus, St. Higinus, St. Pius I., St. Anicetus, St. Soter, St. Eleutherius, St. Victor I. #### TWELFTH DIVISION.

This Division consisted of 27 carriages, many of which were decorated with flags, wreaths and emblems or mottoes suitable to the day and the occasion.

GENERAL APPEARANCE OF THE PROCESSION.

The general appearance of the procession was grand and imposing. Never before perhaps did our city witness so gorgeous and brilliant a pageant as that in honor of Pope Pius IX. Whether viewed in point of numbers or in the elaborate character of the triumphal cars, or the taste with which the whole was arranged, it was in every respect creditable. The century cars were particularly attractive. That representing the Nineteenth century had a life-size painting of the present Pope, while that representing the First century carried a beautiful painting representing the Saviour handing the keys to St. Peter, which the latter received kneeling. The children in those cars were neatly dressed in white and wore long white veils and wreaths. The car containing the thirty-one children representing the different nationalities in the city was the object of much favorable comment. Each girl carried in her hand a flag with her nationality printed thereon. It is scarcely possible that so many persons, representing so many different nationalities, were ever before assembled in so small a space. The car representing the universality of the Church was also much admired. A round frame, enclosing a map of the world, stood in this car, and around the margin was written, "The Catholic Church; she claims all races as her children." The five men representing the Crusades were objects of much curiosity. The quaint dress and armor, and coat of mail worn by the leaders were closely scrutinized. A photograph of the five men was taken on the street. The Ancient Order of Hibernians made a splendid display. Their banners are, perhaps, the most gorgeous on the coast. Three new divisions of the Order have been organized, and two of those have beautiful banners. One represents Robert Emmett in the dock, and the other the battle of Clontarf. The beautiful triumphal car of St. Mary's Parish was very much admired, as well as the magnificently decorated cars containing the young ladies. The children of our Lady of Mercy School were very neatly dressed, each wore a sash across the shoulder and breast. The Church of St. Boniface (German) made a very beautiful display. The car representing the foundation of the Church contained a mossy rock upon which rested a round tower. There were six other cars very beautifully decorated. Then came some boys dressed in red suits, white surplices and red caps, lending variety to the already bewildering scene. There were many other features in the procession which were highly creditable, and the result of assiduity, care and taste, but they were too numerous to mention in detail. The triumphal cars were splendid in design and finish, while the numerous mottoes with which they were almost covered were tasteful and suitable. All the young ladies who participated were neatly and richly dressed, and seemed to understand the importance of the duty assigned them. Every car was covered with Papal and American flags, and an abundance of hunting was not wanting. It can be said that the whole was tasteful and creditable and worthy of the people of the Church, while it was also a handsome tribute to the reigning Pontiff.

The procession was the longest, perhaps, ever seen in San Francisco. It is estimated that it contained nearly 12,000 people. The actual count places the number at 11,750, and the number of vehicles at 404. The time the procession took to pass a given point varied. The longest time is 2 hours and 32 minutes, and the shortest 2 hours and 10 minutes. The route was along Fifth to Howard, to Fourth, to Mission, to Third, to Market, to Montgomery, to Broadway, to Kearny, to Market, to Thirteenth. Countermarching on Market it returned to Kearny, to Post, to the Pavilion. An idea of its length may be obtained from the fact that when the right of the procession reached Kearny after having countermarched, the left had only just entered Montgomery street; or in other words, it extended from Market and Montgomery to Broadway, along Kearny to Market, to the San José dépôt and back again to Kearny. The procession was orderly and well marshaled, and reflects the highest credit on the Grand Marshal, James R. Kelly, and his Aids. It passed off without accident, so far as could be ascertained.

The cortege did not arrive at the Pavilion much before 4:30, and the proceedings opened about 5 o'clock by the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner." On the platform were Bishop Alemany, Fathers Gallagher, Prendergast, Grey, Bouchard and other prominent dignitaries of the Church, the Grand Marshal, the President and other officers of the day. Grand Marshal Kelly, after the meeting had been called to order by President Burnett, read the programme of the day, which was followed by an artistic rendition by the choir, of the Hymn of Pius IX, the words of which are as follows:

"GOD BLESS OUR POPE."

[From the Cantica Sacra.]

Full in the panting heart of Rome,	Then surging through each hallowed gate,
Beneath th' Apostle's crowning Dome,	Where martyrs' glory, in peace, await,
From Pilgrims lips that kiss the ground,	It sweeps beyond the solema plain,
Breathes in all tongues one only sound:	Peels over Alps, across the Main:
"God bless our Pope, the great, the good,"	"God bless our Pope, the great, the good."
The golden roof, the marble walls,	From torrid South to frozen North,
The Vatican's majestic halls	The wave harmonious stretches forth,
The note redouble, till it fills	Yet strikes no chord more true to Rome's
With echoes sweet the Seven Hills:	That rings within our hearts and homes:
"God bless our Pope, the great, the good."	"God bless our Pope, the great, the good."

For, like the sparks of unseen fire,
That speaks along the magic wire,
From home to home, from heart to heart,
The words of countless children dart:
"God bless our Pope, the great, the good."

THE ORATION.

The oration of the day, which followed, was given by the Hon. Zach Montgomery, and was a very lengthy production, reviewing the history of the Pontificate of Pius IX., the present condition of the Papal States, and the Romish Church in general throughout the world. Mr. Montgomery was only partially audible, this being in some degree due to the fact that many persons would keep tramping about the galleries. Before its conclusion, the salute given by a detachment under Captain Bluxome's command, was fired.

THE TE DEUM.

Next followed a splendid performance of the Te Deum Laudamus by Lambillotte, which received hearty and prolonged applause. The musical arrangements, under the direction of Mr. William Toepke, organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, were in all respects most satisfactory. The band of thirty performers included many of our leading professors: Messrs. Joseph Schmidt, Schlotte, Heckmans, Pipers, Yunker, Fisher, Stochr, Schmidt, Evans and others. The choir was very complete, including the following performers: Sopranis, Mrs. Uhrig, Mrs. Gleeson, Mrs. Anderson, Miss Grey, Miss Blanche, Miss Young, Miss Waterman and volunteers. Altos, Mrs. Evans, Mrs. Toepke, Mrs. Cameron, Mrs. Melville, Mrs. Scott, Mrs. Waterman, Mrs. Hopkins, Miss King, Miss Pennie and volunteers. Tenors, Dr. Belling, Messrs. Emile, Anderson, Swift, Mrs. Charles, Bacharach, Brown, Lewis and Willey. Bassi, Messrs. Uhrig, Schnabel, Newman, Kretzman, Loomis, Wunderlich, McCabe, Roncovieri, Stockmeyer, Nathanson and Egan. The proceedings terminated with the Benediction, offered by the Archbishop. The large assembly, probably numbering at least six or seven thousand, dispersed quietly. A collection was taken up at the doors.

THE ILLUMINATION, ETC.

In the evening a considerable portion of the city was illuminated, especially Third, Fourth, Mission, Market and Howard streets. In most portions of the city private residences were illuminated. A number of wickets and bombs were fired off. The chapel of St. Mary's Cathedral, where Bishop Alemany and his clergy reside, were resplendent with lights; while the front of the church was illuminated with a Bengal light. St. Ignatius College was illuminated with an electric light, shown by a Fresnel reflector, which made the whole block as light as day. The residence of the clergy of St. Patrick Church was also illuminated, while the sidewalks and streets were lit up with blue lights, etc. The rest of the Catholic Churches participated also in the general illumination.

ARCHBISHOP ALEMANY SERENADED.

About ten o'clock in the evening the Most Reverend Archbishop Alemany and the clergy of St. Mary's Cathedral were serenaded by the Grand Marshal and his Aids, and a large concourse of people. A band of music accompanied the party and discoursed sweet strains, while a liberal display of fireworks sent the air a lurid appearance. After playing several airs, the Marshals were invited into the house of the clergy of the Cathedral, where a very agreeable time was spent and the serenaders treated to wine. The health of the Pope was drank with enthusiasm, also the health of the Archbishop. The Bishop of Marysville, Right Rev. Dr. O'Connell, was present, and his health was also drank. He made a neat reply, and referring to the celebration, said it would be like gilding gold or painting a lily to attempt to add to what he had seen. The health of Rev. Dr. Croke, V. G., was also proposed and drank. The Very Rev. Father Prendergast made a handsome reply to the toast of his health, referring therein to the celebration, and according due praise to the gentlemen who managed it. Other toasts were proposed and drank, and after about half an hour had been pleasantly spent the party separated, and the celebration ended.

The following telegram was dispatched to the Pope:

SAN FRANCISCO, July 2, 1871.

To His Holiness, Pius Ninth, Rome:—Fifty thousand of your devoted children celebrate here to-day, with enthusiastic joy, the twenty-fifth anniversary of your Pontificate, and wishing your life prolonged to see the States of the Church and your freedom restored, kneeling, they ask your apostolic blessing.

ARCHBISHOP ALEMANY.

JAMES R. KELLY, Grand Marshal.

PETER DONAHUE.

---

In this number of the Mail Bag we present to our readers the likeness of one of our most esteemed and honored citizens, PETER DONAHUE, Esq., President of the San Francisco Gas Company.

Mr. DONAHUE was born in Glasgow, Scotland, January 22, 1822, of Irish parents, with whom he came to the United States in 1835. The family located in Dutchess County, New York, on their arrival in this country, where the subject of this sketch remained until he arrived at the age of sixteen, when he was apprenticed to learn the mill-wright and engineering business in Patterson, New Jersey. After becoming master of his trade he found employment in the Cold Springs Iron Works, New York, and afterward in the Novelty Works, New York City. After leaving the latter establishment, he went to Peru under a contract with the Government of that country, and was the engineer in 1847 of the first steamship owned by the Peruvian Government, and the first steamship that ever came through the Straits of Magellan.

Hearing of the discovery of gold in California, like thousands of others, he rushed to the new Eldorado, and arrived in San Francisco on the steamship Oregon in 1849. Immediately after his arrival in this city he went to the gold fields, where he remained some months, but meeting with but little success he left the mines to join his brothers, Michael and James, in San Francisco, who had just arrived from Mexico across the plains. The three brothers engaged in the blacksmith and boiler-making business, first in Montgomery street, near Jackson, and afterward in the then called Happy Valley, where the Union Foundry now stands, and shortly afterward added to their establishment an extensive foundry and machine shop. To them belong the credit of melting the first cast-iron in the State, and that with the old-fashioned mode of blacksmith bellows, and for which the enormous sum of one dollar per pound was paid for the casting, and very little margin of profit at that, owing to the high price of wages and material at that time. The job was done for the steamer McKim. The merchants in San Francisco interested in castings, finding that they could be obtained here, soon patronized the foundry for wagon-boxes, plow-shares, house-fronts and such other castings as the country required at that time. Among the early manufactures of this foundry was a printing press, on which was printed the newspaper which announced the first tidings of the admission of California into the Union in 1850, and the first quartz mill ever erected in this State.

In 1852 Mr. Donahue conceived the idea of lighting the city with gas, and with the co-operation of his brother James a franchise was obtained from the city for laying down the pipes and a contract made for lighting the city with gas. Mr. Donahue's efforts in this direction were crowned with complete success, and in two years from the time the franchise was granted the illuminating fluid was coursing through the streets in its iron cells, lighting up the city with a brilliant, useful light, to the great joy of its inhabitants. Under the Presidency of James Donahue (who also founded the Occidental Hotel), the able financier, J. Mora Moss, and the subject of this sketch, Peter Donahue, Presidencies, the corporation has prospered year by year until it has become one of the richest in the city, and as a consequence, under such able management, a profitable investment to the stockholders.

Mr. Donahue's energies were not confined to these enterprises, for we find him, in 1857 and '58, running a formidable opposition line of steamers between San Francisco and Sacramento, which eventually proved a financial success, like nearly all those which he has ever undertaken.

In 1860 the Federal Government concluded to build a steamer (the Saginaw) on this coast, and the contract for all the iron work, engines, boilers, etc., was awarded to Mr. Donahue, who executed the same to the entire satisfaction of the Navy Department. The steamer proved to be staunch and seaworthy, and a model of naval architecture.

Shortly after the unhappy civil war had broken out between the North and the South, Mr. Donahue was awarded the contract for building the ironclad monitor Camanche. The material came around Cape Horn in the ship Aquilla, and arrived here in the fall of 1863, and sank in the harbor the night the Aquilla was brought to the wharf, in consequence of a severe southwest gale that sprang up. Did the wreck remain under water? No; through the indomitable energy and perseverance of Mr. Donahue and the assistance of Mr. Fletcher, Agent of the New York Insurance Company, the Insurance Companies sent out wreckers from New York, and the materials for the Camanche were rescued from the water, and in the short space of three months from the laying of the keel the Camanche was floating on her element, ready to repel the incursions of rebel cruisers, and is now lying in good order ready for service at Mare Island.

In 1862 Mr. Donahue became interested in the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad Company, and in 1863 increased his interest by purchase so that he owned one-third of the stock of the Company. Mr. Newhall also became the owner of one-third of the stock at the same time. The numerous perplexing questions and financial difficulties connected with this Company soon vanished before the iron will of Mr. Donahue, and with the aid of his associate, Mr. H. M. Newhall, the enterprise was conducted to a most successful conclusion, at the same time without the aid of subsidy from the General Government.

In 1861, Mr. Donahue, with others, obtained a franchise for a street railroad in San Francisco, known as the Omnibus Railroad Company's route, being the first street railroad constructed in California. On the organization of the Company, in 1861, Mr. Donahue became the President, and with the exception of a few years, has been President of the road from that time to the present.

Soon after the sale of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad to Mr. Stanford and his associates—the great railroad kings of the Pacific Coast—we find Mr. Donahue in Sonoma County, reviving a railroad project (that had slept for years) from the town of Donahue to Healdsburg. The road was commenced in September, 1870, and on the 15th of April, 1871, the cars were running to Healdsburg, a distance of eighty miles from San Francisco—forty miles by water and forty miles by rail—including workshops. What may most astonish capitalists in this connection is the fact that the whole road was built with white labor exclusively, and the rolling stock and engines built in San Francisco—on the principle that he wished to spend his money where he had accumulated it. Of course Mr. Donahue had no one's opinion to please in all this matter but his own—he being the sole owner.

We know of Mr. Donahue to be interested in many corporations, among which we will mention the Hibernia Bank and the First National Gold Bank of San Francisco, in both of which he is a director and a large stockholder.

The brief sketch we have thus given of the leading incidents in the life of Mr. Donahue serve to show, better than any labored eulogium, the manner of man he is. These facts tell their own story; each of them is eloquent of his characteristics—of duties fulfilled and difficulties overcome. Like many other successful men of our eminently practical age, Mr. Donahue had to forego, in a degree, the advantages of a thorough education in early life, and trust to a clear, sound brain, seconded by a vigorous physical constitution, to his advancement in life. His present position shows that these have not failed him. Commencing humbly enough, he rose with every occasion, until, from being the instrument in carrying out other men's ideas, he became himself a projector of great enterprises, and the controller of enormous wealth. He stands to-day one of the representative men of the country of his adoption.

Firm and self-reliant, with the will to dare, and the judgment and business experience, joined to the command of capital, he is able to carry out to a successful termination any project upon which he may enter. To such men the progress of our country is due. Mr. Donahue can with commendable pride point to San Francisco for the evidence of his busi-

REVIEW OF THE PAST MONTH.

Commercially speaking, we have had stirring times for the past month. Business has been active, and for the most part quite satisfactory. Imports from afar have been considerable, embracing large and well assorted cargoes of British, French and German goods; several full cargoes from New York and Boston; teas, silks, spices, etc., from Japan and China; sugars and Coffees from Manila and Java; sugar, rice, etc., from the Hawaiian Islands; oranges and other fruits from Tahiti. Our steamship lines from Australia are giving us a foretaste of a large prospective trade in Colonial wools, tallow, etc. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, via Aspinwall and Panama, continue its semi-monthly steamers, making connections with various other steam lines on the Atlantic, besides those of the Central and South American service. Then we have the North Pacific Transportation Co., with its fleet of coasting steamers making weekly trips up and down the coast, thereby contributing largely to the carrying trade of the port. Our lumber coasting fleet is of vast importance to the commerce of this city. Add to all this traffic the carrying of coast products and general merchandise form no inconsiderable part. The coal imports from the United Kingdom and her Colonies have been unusually large and numerous during the month, giving much life and animation along the city front; and although our influx of shipping has been large, it is to be regretted that our exports of grain and flour are not up to past averages, consequently freights are scarce, and likely so to be for many months to come. Tonnage is therefore plentiful and freights low and nominal, compelling many vessels to go elsewhere seeking business.

The overland traffic is steadily augmenting, and the Pacific Railroad doing an immense business. The tea trade is of itself an important item, and promises a large increase in the future. Progress is being developed likewise in coffee, sugar, and other staple goods required by the interior, whose population is rapidly augmenting wherever the railroads penetrate the wilderness, thereby increasing constantly its demands upon us. And in addition to this, we have been quietly shipping East considerable quantities of wool, wine, hops, and other products of the soil.

There is, however, another side to this picture. For months past we have been drawing from Ohio, Illinois, and other Eastern cities, considerable supplies of provisions, consisting of bacon, hams, lard, butter, cheese, etc. Now, these articles we ought really to produce here in quantities sufficient for the supply of our own home wants; but we have this year largely failed to do, owing, it is said, to the increased consumptive wants of the coast—our products not, this year, keeping pace therewith. Oregon has heretofore helped us out considerably on the meat question, but her extended lines of railroad, and our large irrigating schemes, canals, and other internal works have consumed largely of salted meats, and thus impoverished us to an unexpected extent.

On the evening of the 23d inst. our city was visited with a destructive fire, destroying a fine block of eight brick stores upon Market street, commonly called Redington, Hostetter & Co.'s Block. The buildings were owned by Mr. Harpending, and, like the merchandise destroyed, insured for about half its value. About a million dollars of property were destroyed, including the large stock of drugs, chemicals, etc., owned by the firm named. It is surprising that at the ruinously low rates ruling for insurance, say forty to fifty cents on $100 per annum, that the parties were not more fully covered by insurance. The rate is altogether too low for profit to the underwriters, and this lesson may perhaps bring about a new tariff in rates. The remark has been made that the losses incurred by our local fire insurance companies are less by considerable than that covered by foreign underwriters. If so, this is the natural result of a too active competition for business.

Our receipts of grain are considerably below those of a corresponding period of the past two years, and our exports of breadstuff correspondingly light. There is, however, quite an active business daily done upon the Produce Exchange. The membership has largely increased, and although there is less grain arriving, and to be handled, yet there is a marked increase in the volume of business daily transacted at its morning sessions.

Our warehouses upon the water front are being rapidly filled with flour and grain, partly the result of speculation. The price of wheat and other grain is now, and has for some time past, been above a safe shipping point, yet there are many persons here who believe that, owing to short crops here and in Europe, prices must advance yet more, and money being plenty and easily obtainable at low rates of interest, the inducements to speculate are somewhat weighty among dealers who heretofore received wheat, etc., largely on commission, but by reason of short crops have no business without becoming operators.

Upon the receipt of London advices that the price of Quicksilver had been advanced to £11, "the powers that be" on this coast at once advanced their price to 85 cents per pound. This gives a large profit to those having control of this market.

The market for wool is exceedingly dull and depressed, and the article quite unsalable, except for selected clips of standard value. Burry and inferior clips are neglected, at nominal rates. In the present condition of the market it is difficult to give quotations, particularly now that Eastern buyers have withdrawn from the coast.

Of the new crop of hops, about 500 bales have changed hands, chiefly for shipment to New York, though including a parcel of ten tons prime quality for English account, to go forward by rail. Present price 35 to 40 cents for good to choice.

Hides command good prices, same as ruling for months past. Tallow is scarce and high.

The coal market is well supplied with bituminous—Scotch and English selling at $11.50 by the cargo; West Hartley held higher; Australian commanding $11.50; Anthracite is scarce and high; Cumberland, in bulk, $20; same in casks, $24. Pacific Coast supplies plentiful—Seattle, $10; Coos Bay and Nanaimo, $10 and $11; Bellingham Bay, $9; Mount Diablo, $8.25. No Chili in market.

Coffee is held with considerable firmness, being in few hands—Rio, 16c.; Guatemala, 16½ and 16¾ cents; Java, 24 and 25 cents. The stock here is not large.

SUGAR.—The stock of raws on sale is unusually light. What remains of late imports, other than Hawaiian, is in the hands of refiners. We quote good to choice grocery grades at 9 and 11½ cents; refining, 7 to 8c.; refined white, 14 and 15 cents; yellow coffee and golden C, 12½ and 13c.

SALT.—The market is overstocked with Liverpool. We quote coarse, $16 and $17; fine, $18 and $20; Pacific Coast, $8 and $14 per ton.

SPICES.—There is a fair stock in hand, with a moderate demand. We quote allspice at 14 and 15 cents; cassia, 35 cents; cloves, 36 cents; nutmegs, $1.10; sago and tapioca, 6½ and 7 cents; citron, 40 and 42½ cents.

RICE.—Stocks are liberal. We quote No. 1 China and Siam, 7¼ and 7½ cents; No. 2 do., 6¾ and 7 cents; Carolina and Hawaiian table, 10 and 10½ cents.

WINES.—There is an improved demand for French clarets, champagnes, etc., with sales at full rates.

ON THE PRESERVATION OF WOOD.

The attention of the writer was first called to the subject of the preservation of wood, in India, during 1836 (when only eighteen years old), from the circumstance of the clipper bark Water Witch, of Calcutta, having her transoms repeatedly destroyed by white ants. The most singular feature of the case was, that they attacked that part of the ship only, no other place being touched by them. This part was designed for a store-room, but canvas placed there was immediately destroyed by the pests. Three times in four years new transoms were put in, and on two occasions the timber was kyanized, that is, imbued with a solution of bi-chloride of mercury (corrosive sublimate), but this only slightly delayed the destruction of the wood. Dr. O'Shaughnessy, a gentleman of high scientific attainments, expressed the belief that the albumen of the wood neutralized the poisonous properties of the sublimate, rendering it innocuous to the insects. In the early part of 1839 timber was received from England, which had been creosoted by the process of Mr. Bethel, which had been patented, and which will be described hereafter. The transoms of this Bethelized timber resisted the attack of the white ants, and were perfectly sound in 1848. The ships engaged trading in the Indian Seas swarm with cockroaches, which are very destructive to many things. It is worthy of note that they would not approach within six feet of the creosoted timbers, so that anything stowed on or near to the transoms was safe from their attacks.

On the writer's return to England, in 1841, and during the succeeding year, he was present at a great number of experiments with various chemicals, made by Sir John Scott Lilley, Mr. Brunel, Mr. Stead, Mr. Mingham, the chemist, and others. Through the introduction of his brother, a civil engineer, he was allowed to make himself acquainted with all details. The antiseptic qualities of creosote, or oil of tar, as used by Bethel, was fully acknowledged; but objections as to the offensive odor being great, it was a desideratum to get some preservative which would do for inside work. Kyan's was considered useful in some cases, but not reliable, and it did not appear to sufficiently protect the fibre of the wood, and failed also to protect it from the ravages of insects, either land or marine. One advantage it did possess, and that was, rendering the timber very much less combustible. The sulphate of copper solution introduced some three or four years previously, from France, was found in many cases to be a failure, most probably from careless and ill-timed impregnation with the sulphate. With some kinds of wood it was useless to try it at all. In all experiments made with the metallic salts the tension strength of timber was very materially lessened. In fact it may be safely asserted that only two, or at most three of them, can be considered successful. The Burnett process is of these notably the best when applied to yellow pine, for other woods it is only reliable when protected from wet. Burnettized yellow pine blocks for street-paving were found to be perfectly sound after seven years' service, being laid where the traffic was light. For inside work it is well adapted, because it is less combustible, and being protected from wet, may be considered as imperishable. So far as the writer has seen, insects avoid it even when placed in contiguity with other wood suffering from their ravages.

Next in order may be named the semi-petrifying process, which for wooden pavements was very excellent when faithfully operated upon. The durability of the wood is greatly increased with a very trifling loss of elasticity. For any other work except street-paving or planking it is unsuitable from the great loss of tension strength and its consequent brittleness, similar results, as has been said, although in a less degree, characterized all woods treated with metallic salts. No method has equaled that of Bethel for preserving wood, retaining its elasticity, and protecting it from insect ravages, up to the date of Robbins' process, which is in principle essentially the same; the former using the condensed vapor wherewith to saturate the material, and the latter applying the vapor direct from the retorts.

Of the value of creosote as a preservative there is no question; facts upon facts have multiplied for the last thirty years, showing it far superior for protecting timber from dry-rot, from wet-rot, from the torredo navalis, or from any land worm. The experiments and results of them which I am personally acquainted with, prove this beyond a doubt, and the other evidence from all quarters is overwhelming. There only remains, to retard its general use, the unpleasant odor which it emits; this removed, we need seek no more for an antiseptic. Till it be removed, however, some of the other methods can, when required, be resorted to. It would be only taking up the time of the reader to enumerate the vain attempts made to ensure success in the preservation of wood the last fifty years. Passing by the carbonizing, or partial carbonizing of the surface, or of the ends, pursued much in France, and formerly in England and the United States, and the application of pyroligneous oil, or boiled linseed oil, which at best only protect the surface from atmospheric influences, the writer will briefly state some of the experiments and results, with the processes adopted in the several cases which he was present at:

1st. Sulphate of copper, in solution, is filtered through the longitudinal grain of the wood from end to end. This must be done between May and November, and is more reliable if applied as is the Bethel or the Burnett process. They employ for their purpose an air-pump, and create a vacuum in the chamber, in which the wood is placed, before admitting the liquid. It is cheap, as the solution is weak, but the value of this method is greatly over-estimated.

2d. Place the wood in an air-tight chamber; exhaust the air, and then admit, first sulphate of iron, and after drawing it off, admit a solution of chloride of lime; sulphate of lime is formed and deposited, and also chloride of iron, the former insoluble. For the chloride of lime, carbonate of soda is said to have been substituted with success, but the writer has never seen it tried; the result would be carbonate of iron and sulphate of soda. In the first of these cases the wood was much weakened, breaking with but little more than half the strain it bore in its normal condition; but it was not so hardened as to prevent its being easily worked.

3d. Similarly inject lime water, and either let the wood afterwards remain in an atmosphere of carbonic acid, or force the carbonic acid in under pressure, and the result is, the pores are filled with carbonate of lime, a semi-petrified wood, hard to work, but durable for street pavements or planks. It is a tedious operation to prepare it; it renders the wood almost imperishable, but very brittle.

4th. The Burnett process, which is the best of those employing metallic salts: The timber being prepared before, is placed in air-tight vessels, the air is exhausted, and a solution of chloride of zinc, about two parts zinc-chloride to one-hundred parts of water admitted; apply a pressure for three or four hours of eight atmospheres (120 lbs. per square inch); afterwards the liquor that drains can be preserved for future use.

5th. The Bethel process: The timber is placed in air-tight chambers; the creosote is admitted and forced into the pores of the wood by a pressure of 120 lbs. to the inch. It has been asserted, however, that even this pressure, continued for ten hours, fails to make the creosote penetrate into the heart of heavier timber than say 16-inch square, so that such material has, when the cost was immaterial, been Burnettized as described in the previous case to this, and subsequently creosoted.

It is to be remarked, that of all woods, the yellow pine is the most successfully treated. One piece, ten feet long and twenty inches square, Burnettized and then Bethelized, was placed between two piles twenty-five feet below water, and left there for seven years and a half. It was found perfectly sound and uninjured; smaller pieces placed in different positions, and examined from four to eight years afterward, were in every case but one found sound to the very core when examined under a powerful microscope. These smaller pieces had simply been creosoted; one piece did show decay in the heart, and it was evident this had existed when the wood was operated on, and that the creosote had arrested the decay. Creosoted piles alternating with others were sound when the others had been reduced from fourteen inches square to six inches, and honeycombed through the remaining part. Those piles driven in Southampton, England, in 1848, were found in 1854 as sound as when driven. Pieces were placed at half-tide marks on piers and wharfs, both in salt and fresh water. Some were buried, but all, with the one exception above noted, were as good and sound as when first placed in their several positions seven years before, and in one case nearly eight years. Railroad sleepers in England, at Crewe, were as sound after sixteen years as they were when laid. Next to creosoting is Burnett's process; it is cheap, and in-tures the wood less than other metallic salt impregnatives do. For wharves, piles, streets, ship-timbers, creosoting is far superior to any other process of wood preservation.

Among the experiments made, some of which have been described, were two others, viz.: Impregnating the wood with phosphate of soda in vacuo first, and again impregnating it in partial vacuo with acetate of lead, phosphate of lead being in this case deposited in the wood. Also, impregnating similarly, first with acetate of lead and afterwards with carbonate of soda. In this case carbonate of lead (white lead) was deposited. The effect of this last was found nearly as good as Burnettizing, but was much more expensive, besides requiring great care. In view of the great quantity of wood used in paving and planking the suburban streets of this city, and which so often shows rapid signs of decay, the preservation of the timber for these purposes has been singularly neglected. The cost at which it can be done at the establishment which is in operation here is very trifling, and more than doubles the value of the wood, by increasing its durability.

WOOD PULP FOR PAPER.

This production is known to offer considerable advantages over the pulp of esparto grass, or other materials of the same nature used for papermaking. It is capable of producing any description of paper, from the coarsest kinds to the most finished writing-paper, and may now be made a very simple and comparatively inexpensive process. By Sinclair's patent wood pulp machinery, the cost of production to the unbleached stage is £8 per ton. About 42 cwt. of wood makes 1 ton of paper or dry pulp. Although the best white pine wood, at a cost of £2 10s. to £3 per ton, is selected for the most perfect samples, coarser and even damaged wood, which can be obtained in almost any quantity at about £1 per ton, is largely used for the inferior qualities of paper. The wood is first chipped up into thin pieces of about 1 inch broad, 2 inches to 3 inches long, and  $\frac{1}{8}$  inch thick. It is then put into the boiler, and a solution of caustic soda poured over it, in the proportion of 600 gallons to 10 cwt. of dry wood. The boiler is then screwed down and fired, until it attains a pressure of 180 pounds to 200 pounds to the square inch, when the fire is drawn, and the boiler allowed to cool down. In about half an hour the lye is blown off, the top door is removed, and the contents scalded. The discharge-door is then screwed off, and the pulp drawn and washed with pure water in a poaching engine. The fibre having been completely separated from the resin and other matters, become easily pulped, whilst the latter are washed away. The boiler, which is tested by hydraulic power to 400 pounds pressure to the square inch, is made of the strongest material and shape; the plates are of the very best quality, and the seams are all double riveted. The furnace is in front at the bottom of the boiler, which is built upright on its seat, and there is a discharge branch in the rear. The flue goes round the boiler spirally to the top, and thus produces an equal heat at every part. A simple internal arrangement secures a rapid circulation of the lyes through the material and effectually prevents the wood from being charred. The pulp produced is stated to be far superior in length and firmness of fibre to any wood pulp yet known, and the first cost and the expense of working are considerably less than those of any other apparatus in use. When the washing process is concluded, the wood is left in the condition of washed or unbleached pulp, of the value of £15 per ton, as per table given below. The whole plant required for producing about 10 tons of this pulp per week can be erected at a cost of £1,200, and worked by four men of very ordinary skill.

It is said that at some paper-mills in Scotland, where they purchase pulp in a state of complete preparation for the mill, they have been paying £16 10s. per ton for the pulp of esparto grass, containing 59 per cent. of moisture, so that it must take two tons of this pulp to make one ton of paper, at a total cost of £33, and this therefore shows a profit of 100 per cent. to the manufacturers of wood pulp. It is further suggested that the erection of a recovery of waste furnace, to evaporate the soda from the lye, after the pulp has been boiled in it, will insure a saving of 50 per cent. the cost of the caustic soda. A considerable number of the Scotch paper-makers are setting up the necessary apparatus for substituting wood for esparto grass, in view of the greater advantages the former is found to secure. Mr. John M'Nicol, of Glasgow, is the agent.

Materials and cost in the production of wood pulp, equal to one ton of paper ready for passing through the papermill :	£	s	d
Forty-three cwt. of wood, at 30s. per ton.....	3	4	0
Caustic soda, for boiling the above, at 14s. per cwt. and 28 lbs. per cwt. of wood.....	7	10	6 or, about $80. In view of the abundance of timber procurable on the Pacific Coast, it would appear that the making of paper from wood pulp offers another opportunity for the investment of capital, and for developing another industrial resource of the country.

THE STATE FAIR.

We went to Sacramento—not to see the races, but to carefully examine the manufactures of the State exhibited in the Pavilion, and to note what improvements had been made in the various branches of home industries since the last State Fair. The result was very gratifying, and more than fulfilled our expectations. The building, although comparatively small, after being accustomed to the Mechanics' Pavilion in San Francisco, is admirably adapted to the purpose for which it is used. It is laid off with great taste, and with due regard to the classification of the exhibits. Although the weather was intensely hot, the building was cool and well ventilated, and both exhibitors and visitors seem perfectly satisfied with all the arrangements. We only heard one complaint, and that seemed universal: it was of a certain pompous secretary, who, "clothed in a little brief authority," did his best to make himself odious and everybody else uncomfortable, but even this circumstance failed to disturb our equanimity, and putting on our criticizing spectacles, we proceeded to view the goods on exhibition. On entering the Pavilion we first noticed the

SINGER SEWING MACHINES,

to which every visitor at once wends his way to examine the very beautiful display of these favorite machines. Mr. Yates, the San Francisco agent, obligingly described to us the particular features of these machines, which render them so superior to others, being suitable not only for light, but also for the heaviest kinds of work. The sworn returns of each company places the Singer at the head of the lot of all competitors, their returns showing a sale of 45,000 machines above the others. The machines are strongly made, handsome and durable, and are an ornament to any parlor. We next pass on to some very handsome cases of exhibited by Messrs. Liddle & Kaeding, of Washington street, San Francisco, which far surpass anything of the sort ever exhibited at a State Fair. Breech-loading rifles and shot-guns of the most admirable manufacture and finish. The Ballard deringer, and the celebrated XL pistol, which is now attracting so much attention, being servicable both for army officers and civilians. Small, light, and of immense power, carrying a 0.38 inch ball. A very interesting feature of this display is a collection of shells, fired by the Prussians into Paris during the late war, and brought by Mr. Kaeding to this country, and also a case containing a quantity of the siege-bread used by the beleagured Parisians during that memorable investment. This exhibition is under the supervision of Mr. Child, Messrs. Liddle & Kaeding's well known and popular manager. Messrs. W. J. T. Palmer & Co. have a very fine display of both for school and office purposes. The school furniture is remarkably light, strong and durable, besides having a very neat appearance. It is made of several handsome varieties of wood—one of which, the Eastern Cherry, is expressly imported for this firm. It bears a high polish, is hard and able to stand the rough usage to which school furniture is subjected. They also exhibit a magnificent secretaire, made of black walnut. This desk was not (Mr. Palmer informs us) made expressly for the State Fair, but is a sample of the general style of work which this firm is in the habit of turning out. A more splendidly-finished piece of furniture we never saw, with the exception of the Lick House bar, which was also manufactured by Mr. Palmer, who is now, we understand, under contract to build a similar one for a New York hotel.

FIREARMS,

FURNITURE,

WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINES.

A very handsome stand has been fitted up by Mr. Stoddard, the agent for these justly celebrated machines. The name of Wheeler & Wilson is "familiar in our mouths as household words." We have read about their machines in the newspapers, used them in our homes, and seen them at work all over the world; and they are everywhere pronounced to be what is claimed for them—the perfection of sewing machines. Noiseless in action, they perform all the most delicate maneuvers of which a sewing machine is capable. Every year has seen some valuable addition made to the already almost perfect machine. Tuckers, embroiderers, fellers, braiders, hemmers, together with the silent adjustable draw-feed, have in quick succession been adapted to them, until now, it would seem to be impossible that anything more could be invented that could make such an admirable piece of mechanism more perfect.

BILLIARD TABLES AND FURNITURE.

Our old friend Jacob Strahle (of the firm of Strahle & Co.), is here as he ought to be, with one of the finest billiard tables that we have ever seen. It is fitted with one of Delaney's Patent Wire Billiard Cushions, which, for durability, economy, elasticity and hight, is undoubtedly the best in use. This cushion is made of rubber, to which is added near the edge inside rubber a steel wire lengthwise and communicating to a pin at each end. This pin is operated on by means of a key, as in tuning pianos; consequently the cushion edge is always straight and sharp. On these cushions a player can make nine cushions, whereas on other tables seven cushions are possible, if the ball is struck with great force. The table on exhibition is composed of several thousand pieces of different varieties of wood, and is finished in such a style that it is impossible for the most critical observer to detect any flaw in the manufacture. Mr. Strahle does not confine his exhibition to billiard tables; he has also some of the most superb furniture in laurel and redwood root that it was ever our lot to examine. Mr. Strahle has also on exhibition California woods and tables composed entirely of California woods, and he informs us has just received orders for four of these very elegant pieces of furniture—one for London, one for Paris, one for Chicago, and one for Albany, N. Y.

LOCKS.

The Yale Lock Manufacturing Co., Oscar V. Gerzabek, agents, exhibit a collection of their well-known locks, a glance at which is sufficient to observe and appreciate their worth.

THE WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINES.

These popular machines are here, and so are the well-known faces of the lovely and intelligent operators, whose courtesy and untiring zeal in describing the capabilities of their machines won for them such golden opinions at the late Mechanics' Fair. The Wilcox & Gibbs was one of the pioneer sewing machines, and has been steadily improving on its first patent up to the present time. In action it is perfectly noiseless, and one of its great features is that it sews from one spool, makes the tripple thread seam and twisted loop stitch. As a family machine and as a parlor ornament, the Wilcox & Gibbs has been long held in the greatest favor. In the elegance of manufacture, compactness and superiority of its fittings, it cannot be surpassed. Messrs. Felton & Cutler, the agents for the Pacific Coast, inform us that they will guarantee their machines for five years, which goes far to prove their assertion that they never get out of order.

KNOWLES' PATENT STEAM PUMP.

This pump is in the machinery department of the Pavilion, and is of the capacity of about 30,000 gallons an hour, receiving the first premium at the late Mechanics' Fair, thus proving its superiority over all others, there being five pumps and two water lifters in that exhibition. This pump, however, is by no means the largest size that can be manufactured. Mr. Froher having recently received an order for a pump of 4,000 gallons a minute capacity.

MODEL STEAM HARVESTER.

exhibited by B. F. Cook, of Napa, inventor. This machine is claimed to be the most necessary invention of the age, being a combination of Haynes' header, Pitt's or Russell's separator, and an ordinary steam engine—to run the machinery while it is hauled over the ground by animal power.

CARRIAGE SPRINGS.

Messrs. Wm. M. Betts & Bro., of Market street, who received the gold medal at the Mechanics' Fair, exhibit a splendid display of California-made springs for locomotives, cars and all kind of carriages and wagons. Everybody who passes this stand were compelled to stop and examine these specimens of our home manufacture. Their strength, elasticity, beauty of finish, high polish and general excellence render them what they are claimed to be—the finest springs in use on the Pacific coast. Messrs. Betts have a powerful lever in the Fair with which visitors can test the elasticity and strength of the springs. Some of the express wagon springs require a pressure of 2,500 pounds per set to compress them. These gentlemen have received certificates from every carriage manufacturer in the State, who express their conviction that after three years service these springs will still be without an equal in California.

FIRST PREMIUM SHIRTS.

exhibited by Mrs. Evelyn Morris. Their elegant workmanship, delicate material and perfect finish deserve especial notice. Mrs. Morris has introduced, in a novel and very pretty manner, monograms in the front pleats, instead of studs. The cuffs, also, are perfect little gems of workmanship. Her flannel shirts are marvels, and it was several minutes before we could decide whether we preferred the red, white or blue. We could hardly believe they were flannel till Mrs. Morris assured us that they were French goods), they resembled merino so closely in their appearance and texture. Mrs. Morris is an old pioneer, and her industry, taste and perseverance deserve a fitting reward.

AVERRILL CHEMICAL PAINT COMPANY.

This Company, whose exhibition attracted so much notice in the Mechanics' Fair, exhibit a very fine collection of the various oxides of zinc from which the paints are manufactured, the paints themselves, and specimens of wood and metal painted in various colors. The specialties of this paint are: First—Durability and indestructibility, being composed of a chemical combination which defies alike time and weather. Second—Its readiness of application, effecting a great saving of time and labor. Third—Its universal adaptability, being alike useful for exterior house work, decorating, etc., etc. We are assured that no one using this paint is ever affected by that painful malady the painters' cholera. Fourth—Its resistance to water, as it remains for years impervious to its influence. Fifth—Its special value when applied to iron work. Rust will insinuate itself beneath other paints, but the Averill Chemical Paint prevents corrosion. Many other instances of its advantages might be stated. Suffice it that a saving of 50 per cent. is effected by its use. These paints are exhibited by Yount & Fletcher, 18 Seventh street, Sacramento City.

FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH HAIR RESTORER.

Mr. Fugazi, of K street, Sacramento, exhibits the Fountain of Youth Hair Restorer, and if all he claims for his invention is true, Mr. Fugazi's fortune may be considered made. The dye itself is almost colorless, and has a very fragrant perfume. One or two applications restores gray hair to its natural color. It neither makes the hair lighter or darker than nature intended it, but simply restores such hairs as are prematurely gray to their pristine color and beauty. He also exhibits choice perfumery, and the celebrated Oriental Hair Dye, which, while it is free from all deleterious minerals, is the quickest and most perfect dye ever invented.

BROWN'S PATENT SELF GENERATING GAS-BURNER.

This new gas lamp is intended to supersede the common candle and coal oil, and to make quite a revolution in the gas burners, as it can be supplied at one-fourth the price of ordinary gas. The flame is white, clear and very brilliant, and produces neither smoke nor smell. The lamps, themselves are of metal, and consequently it is almost impossible to break them. The gas is consumed as soon as generated, consequently the lamp is non-explosive. We saw this lamp in operation in the Mechanics' Fair of San Francisco, and were much struck by the superiority and brightness of this light over others which were exhibited there at the same time. It took a premium at the Mechanics' Fair, and we have ascertained the city of Sacramento are using one hundred and twenty-five of these lamps as street lights round the Capitol and in the Governor's mansion.

THE CRANDALL PATENT SPRING BED.

exhibited by Messrs. Cooley & Green, the Proprietors, of 123 Front street, Sacramento. This bed is without doubt one of the most comfortable pieces of furniture on exhibition; it took the first premium in the Mechanics' Fair, and it deserved it. In principle it is simple, and not at all liable to get out of order; the springs are made of steel, galvanized with tin. The coils are made in couplets, and are consequently self-supporting, thus dispensing with twine and cords. No amount of dampness can corrode the steel or rust the springs. We have seen many beds, and reposed our weary limbs upon all sorts of extraordinary places, but while we contemplate the "Crandall," we pronounce it the most inviting of all.

THE NEW WILSON SEWING MACHINES.

Adjoining the display of Mr. Strahle is the stand of the above famous, although recently invented machines. Whatever good qualities and new inventions other machines possess have been adapted to the Wilson. The proprietors have endeavored to make this a family sewing machine, one the purchase of which is within the reach of all classes, and they have undoubtedly succeeded. Lightness, elegance and durability are combined, and the result is a neat and indestructible machine. Several improvements, which have not as yet been introduced into other sewing machines, are fitted to the Wilson, and no one who understands the art of sewing with the foot can fail to appreciate them. In the first place, the wheel is placed at the back of the machine lengthwise, doing away with the necessity of a guard, and leaving more room for the operator. The machine we saw in use at the Fair had one of the new gathering attachments at work, and is a perfect piece of mechanism. The ladies at all events (and they should be the best judges) seem to give the preference to this machine. Mr. Norton, the agent for the Pacific Coast, informed us that this company is not connected with any other.

HOLT'S MARKING WHEEL

is represented by Mr. and Mrs. Sheplar, and this very ingenious contrivance attracts considerable attention.

MACHINE FOR MAKING SCREWED BOOTS,

exhibited by the inventor, Mr. N. Lumsden. This is an exceedingly ingenious machine, and is intended to be used with either an iron-plated last or a simple wooden one. It is claimed by the inventor that this machine is much cheaper than the French invention, costing only $50, while the latter costs $200. Four dozen pairs of boots can be screwed together in a day by one man.

CALIFORNIA MADE FURNITURE.

Mr. John Brenner, of Sacramento, exhibits a magnificent display of chamber, cabinet, and office furniture, made of California woods—laurel and black walnut. These Fairs are useful institutions; they are valuable, if only for one reason, viz.: informing an inquiring public where they can procure the best goods. Few have any idea that Sacramento can turn out such splendid productions as these. Still, here they are. While we are astonished at finding these branches of our commerce so rapidly increasing in importance, we can but admire the energy and perseverance of the men who are building up such manufactures on our coast. Mr. Brenner has not only equaled our San Francisco firms, but has shown his ability to excel most of them. His chef-d'œuvre in the present instance is a complete bedroom set of laurel and rosewood, valued at $1,000. He also exhibits two gilded arm-chairs of black walnut, the backs and seats of which are covered with the most exquisite Indian needlework.

PIANOS.

Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., through their agent, Mr. Wm. G. Badger, exhibit six of these magnificent pianos, consisting of orchestral-grand, (which is of a novel shape, but elegant construction,) and various square pianos. Mr. Badger informs us that these instruments have already taken 39 premiums, without including those lately awarded at the Mechanics' Fair. For richness of tone, durability and general excellence, these pianos are unequalled. Their melodious tones filled the Pavilion "from early morn to dewy eve," with floods of melody. We are pleased with these pianos, and if any young lady wishes to express her gratitude for past favors, she can send us one of the Hallet & Davis pianos.

YOLO BACON,

exhibited by James Asberry of Woodland. This bacon is simply enormous; the hog, before killing, weighed 1,200 pounds. Mr. Asberry tells us that next year he will bring the hog along—this being only a pig.

MISSION CANDLE WORKS.

Messrs. Winter, Maurer & Co., of 108 Bush street, San Francisco—the recipients of the Gold Medal in the Mechanics' Fair—exhibit their very fine display of all kinds of steric acid candles. The most noticeable feature of these candles is their hardness, durability in all climates and brilliancy of light. They burn with great regularity, being almost equal to gas, and are inexpensive, being sold at the same rates as the Eastern candles, with which they are in direct opposition. They are manufactured in all sizes and all colors and for all purposes, such as used in chambers, railroads, coaches, hotels, etc. Mr. Maurer particularly drew our attention to the hotel candles, which are made of a convenient length and are a great saving to hotel proprietors. The durability, purity and firmness of the material used is evidenced by the fine busts made of steric, and exhibited in the Fair.

WAX FLOWERS.

These imitations of Nature's gayest garments are well represented by the Misses

Cook and Skaggs. The first-named lady exhibited in the Mechanics' Fair, and received a diploma; the latter will undoubtedly receive a similar tribute on this occasion.

GOPHER TRAP.

G. A. Lloyd is here with his original gopher catcher. We predict a gold medal for this California invention.

PAINTINGS.

Mr. Oscar Kalschmidt makes a very creditable display of portraits and historical paintings. There is one thing in this painter which astonishes us: and that is, that a man who has such talent as is displayed in some of his works—such as "Columbus in Chains," etc.—can paint such atrocities as the "Mediatrix." Still, the paintings are well worth the attention of a criticizing public, and we hope they will get it.

PHOTOGRAPHS.

Mr. Taber, as usual, carries off the palm for photographing, although the pictures exhibited by Mr. Todd, of Sacramento, are very good; but then Taber is an exceptional artist, and competition with him is simply absurd.

THE POMOLOGICAL DISPLAY

is very good. Indeed, as might be expected, it far exceeds the collection of fruit in the Mechanics' Fair. The grapes in particular excited universal admiration, and it was almost painful to watch the visitors as they gazed long and wistfully, with watery mouths, through the wire guards which surrounded the tables on which the fruit rested. Bunches of grapes weighing at least fifteen pounds, mammoth pears, enormous citrons, dropsical apples, etc., etc., bewilder the eye of the visitor as he paces up and down the pavilion, while the aroma of the whole delightful chaos fills his system with a very defined longing for some of those peaches. We never steal; peculation, although perhaps no crime, is naughty, but it is very nice, and so were those grapes. The most splendid assortment of this delicious fruit is exhibited by Mr. J. H. Carrington, of Florin, who exhibited among other varieties one bunch of Black Hamburgs which weighs twenty-three pounds. The Horticultural department, although not large, is very tastefully arranged by Mr. George M. Miller—the gentleman who was in charge of the Horticultural exhibition in the Mechanics' Fair. In the center is a very pretty moss-covered arbor, where the tired and overheated visitors can rest their weary limbs and view the lovely flowers by which they are surrounded, and which consist of carefully selected specimens of roses, geraniums, colcus, caladumus, cissus, dahlias, etc., etc., and cut flowers of rare and choice varieties. Mr. F. A. Miller, landscape gardener of San Francisco, who took the first premiums for flowers at the Mechanics' Fair, is the exhibitor of this charming floral display; of his brother George, we have a few remarks to make, as he has reason to believe that his "Great Expectations" will be realized. These expectations can be more easily imagined than described, when we relate the following incident that occurred the other evening: It must be understood, firstly, that in this department are two castiron figures, representing a gardner and his wife. George sleeps in the evening amid the roses, and on Wednesday night reposed his weary limbs in the usual place. Pleasant dreams flitted through his slumbering senses; he fancied he was at home once more embracing his faithful spouse; he clasped her to his manly breast firmly—alas! so firmly that he awoke, and found that his arms encircled the palodus form of the castiron gardner's wife!

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINES.

One of the most prominct features in the State Fair is the display of the above well-known and justly celebrated machines, which contain all the latest improvements over the old styles. Mr. A. H. Suplee, the General Agent for the Pacific Coast, kindly explained to us the mechanism of these machines, and demonstrated to our entire satisfaction the advantages possessed by the Elliptic over the other kinds of sewing machines.

BITTERS.

The Demon Pipifax is here and presides condescendingly over the other Bitters. Everybody tastes them, and all who taste them return to take another sip.

MINERALS.

Mr. Hanks, the Assayist of Clay street, San Francisco, exhibits a magnificent collection of fossil and mineral specimens.

THE MUSIC.

The Mechanics' Fair had a band of music. Perhaps it cost money—most likely it did; but the band at the State Fair was about the meanest conglomeration of talent and ignorance we ever felt disgusted with. Still, poor devils of musicians, it probably was not their fault! They did the best they could, if it was execrable. The contract was farmed out and sold to the lowest bidder, so everything connected with the band was cheap and nasty—not even a drum! Think of it, readers!—not a solitary drum. We would respectfully suggest that the band was a failure.

In closing our remarks on the State Fair we tender our cordial thanks to the officers in connection therewith, who rendered us so many favors, but more particularly are we indebted to Mr. Hoag, the Corresponding Secretary, and Mr. Preece, the obliging Entry Clerk, for their courtesy and attention.

THE HOTELS.

These of course were crowded to their utmost capacity. Sleeping accommodation was out of the question. Still, some of the proprietors strained every nerve to meet the exigencies of the case, and in most instances succeeded. The hotel which was most patronized, (and deservedly, was the Golden Eagle, of which mine host Callahan is the urbane proprietor. Forseeing the influx of visitors to the city, he had everything prepared for the emergency, and the result was perfect routine, order, and general satisfaction. Many of the other hotels raised their prices in consequence of the demand for accommodations; but Mr. Callahan, with his usual integrity, would make no diversion from his ordinary rates; thus visitors to the Fair, and family residents at the hotel were alike charmed and satisfied with the result of his management.

STATISTICAL REPORTS.

Following are the monthly reports of the various public institutions in the city:

THE MINT.

During the month there were received in the United States Branch Mint 115,497 ounces of gold and 118,902 ounces of silver. The coinage amounted to $2,110,000 gold and $100,000 silver, of which $100,000 was in half dollars, $50,000 in eagles, $20,000 in half eagles, $20,000 in quarter eagles, and $2,020,000 in double eagles; total, $2,210,000.

THE CITY TREASURY.

At the close of business hours on the last day of the month the contents of the city and county cash-box was as follows: 36 bags of silver, $54,000; 12 boxes of gold, $240,000; loose coin on trays, $24,147.45; currency, $40.40; warrant on State Treasurer, $50,301.60; coupons paid but not charged to account, $24,545; on special deposit, $3,699.40; total, $376,733.85.

THE MARINE BOARD.

There were received during the month in the thirty licensed sailor boarding-houses 457 seamen. During that period of time 359 were shipped, and at the close of the month there were 190 sailors ready to be shipped, 104 for coasters, and 86 for deep-water vessels.

LUNATICS.

The Commissioners of Lunacy during the month examined and pronounced insane 16 persons; 8 of these were males and 8 females.

MARRIAGES.

The County Clerk during the month issued 162 marriage licenses, which produced a revenue of $324.

THE SHERIFF'S OFFICE.

The amount of fees received in this office during the month was $1,246.75.

THE POLICE COURT.

In this Court, the amount of fines collected was $1,523.25, and the fees $66, making a total of $1,589. Twenty-nine cases were sent to the Grand Jury during the month.

COURT FINANCES.

Following is the financial report of the County Clerk: Fees in the Fourth District Court, $28.50; Twelfth District Court, $443; Fifteenth District Court, $578; Probate Court, $502.50; County Court, $261.75; Court tax and appeals collected in Courts, $693; collected for Library Fund, $651.

THE DEPUTY SUPERINTENDENT of Public Streets and Highways, C. A. Uhrig, makes the following report: Number of verbal notices on persons to remove obstructions on the public streets, 1,356; number of notices obeyed, 1,119; number warned of arrest, 163; number of warrants issued, 84; number of arrests and convictions, 62. During the month about 100 persons were notified to erect fences or bulkhead, in front of their respective premises, in order to prevent sand or dirt from blowing or drifting upon any macadamized, planked or paved street or sidewalk. In obedience to the notices, 25 have built bulkheads, 30 are engaged in building, and warrants will be issued for the arrest of the others for non-compliance with the notices served upon them.

THE ALMS HOUSE.

The Superintendent of this institution report that during the month 31 persons were admitted, 18 were discharged, 5 ran away, 7 died, and 299 remained at the time of making out the report.

THE COUNTY HOSPITAL.

On the last day of the previous month, there were 309 patients in the Hospital. During the month, 216 were admitted, 110 discharged cured, 70 discharged by request; 14 died; 1 was sent to the Alms House, and 1 to the Insane Asylum. Number of outside treatments, 1,961; of births, 2.

THE COUNTY JAIL.

is a science which is daily becoming more perfectly understood. The master of this, the finest of the fine arts in San Francisco, is undoubtedly Morse, whose life-like representations of the familiar faces of our loved ones recalls in absence their living selves.

OUR SWAMP LANDS AND FUTURE GARDENS.

On last Friday, at eight o'clock A. M., the steamer Victor left the wharf at Sacramento for an excursion through the "tule land" bordering the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers. The steamer had been chartered for this trip by Mr. George D. Roberts, who left nothing undone to promote the pleasure and comfort of his guests, among whom were the following, viz: Gov. H. H. Haight, H. P. Coon, S. S. Wright, H. D. Bacon, Wm. B. Hyde, John Tevilo, G. W. Middleton, R. F. Fletcher, P. A. Garrin, M. Wittergern, A. M. Thompson, Solomon Heydenfeldt, M. Garnier, M. Atwood, B. B. Miner, L. A. Booth, Dr. F. Leslie, Dr. C. D. Cleveland, J. W. Glasson, H. T. Holmes, J. G. Ills, A. J. Coffee, J. B. Richmond, W. H. Raymond, Colonel B. S. Alexander, U. S. Engineer, and son, P. J. Robert, G. L. Middleton, W. M. Ryer, N. Hubert, R. C. Rogers, H. G. Walton, Colonel M. Doolan, N. R. Harris, Theodore Bagley, John H. Baird, Wm. Pettigrew, W. M. Ayer, John P. Gaynor, A. G. We returned to San Francisco at 9 P. M. on Saturday, after a most delightful and instructive trip. Every luxury, both edible and drinkable, had been provided of the best quality and in the greatest profusion. We here tender our sincere thanks to Mr. Roberts for his princely hospitality.

We will leave the details of the trip to other correspondents, and will confine ourselves to a few facts that were self-evident to all who practically investigated the tule lands bordering on the San Joaquin River between Antioch and Stockton.

These lands can be thoroughly reclaimed for less than the cost of fencing ordinary uplands.

They can be irrigated at every high tide, if necessary, without any other labor than leaving the flood gates open to allow the water to flow in from the river.

Low tide falls from four to six feet below the surface of the land, thus giving a high which is more than ample for drainage.

The tide water in the river is perfectly fresh.

This facility of irrigation enables the farmers to raise several crops yearly, in some instances as many as four. We saw the third crop of Alfalfa hay that had been cut on the same land this year, the average yield being over two tons per acre for each cutting or crop, or over six tons in all. In other places we saw heavy crops of volunteer hay growing since the grain was cut. In other places we saw fine fields of potatoes that had been planted after the grain was harvested. We heard of two heavy crops of hay and one of grain that had been produced the same season on the same land.

The soil is very light and ashy, and does not bake when irrigated; this character enables it to be plowed and worked without injury when very wet.

The climate is cool and healthy, with a strong daily breeze. We neither saw nor heard of a case of sickness. We saw families who, residing in the midst of the tules for many years, looked the very picture of health. This exemption from sickness is undoubtedly owing to the strong breezes that blow on Suisun Bay and up the San Joaquin River.

This land is very accessible to the San Francisco market; steamers pass along the different rivers every night, arriving in San Francisco before daylight the following morning, thus delivering the produce fresh every day without any land carriage—a very important item in the articles milk, butter, fruit, vegetables, etc., etc.

Heavy freight can be sent by sailing vessels for 50 cents to $1 per ton, delivered alongside of the vessels in San Francisco.

This saving in freight is a very important item, as it enables the farmer to send his most bulky produce to market—such as hay, straw, etc., etc.—which he could not do if he was subject to a high freight tariff. The majority of farmers in the Upper San Joaquin and Sacramento River valleys, and in the northern and southern counties of this State, have to pay over five dollars per ton freight on their produce to San Francisco, or four dollars more per ton than the rate from these tule lands. Say that the yield of each is thirty-one bushels of wheat to the acre; this is about equal to one ton, on which four dollars at least can be saved in freight, which is ten per cent. on forty dollars. This represents the difference in value of the above lands in the item of freight alone; but if the yield of the tule lands should be estimated at sixty-two bushels per acre, which is still under the average, then they are worth eighty dollars per acre more than the others.

The yield of these lands seems incredible. All kinds of fruits, vegetables, grain, grasses, etc., etc., in fact everything grows in the greatest profusion. Twitchell, Island, which two years ago was a swamp as bad as any on the river, yielded this year eighty bushels of wheat and one hundred bushels of barley to the acre, besides a heavy crop of volunteer hay on that portion irrigated after the grain was harvested. A party who had been farming in San Joaquin County became convinced last May that his crops there would be a failure, came down and leased a part of the Webb tract, in order to prevent his stock from starving. In August he prepared and sowed a tract in oats, which yielded over three tons of hay, and left a net profit of over fifty dollars per acre.

If the work that is now being done on these lands for their reclamation had been done in 1852, they would have been overflowed only twice since then—i. e., for eight weeks in 1861-62, and for four weeks in 1867-8—in both cases the water subsided in time to have allowed crops to have been planted in April and May. This land would not have lost a single crop in nineteen years from flood, much less from drought. Owing to the great width of the lower San Joaquin River, which is from one to two miles wide, there is scarcely any current—even in great freshets—except the ebb and flow of the tide. The high water is caused by the back-water from the Sacramento River, and there being so little current, the levees or improvements cannot be injured by it, nor the soil by a deposit of sand, which can only be kept in suspension by a strong current, and is all deposited in the upper San Joaquin and Sacramento. A large part of these lands are already connected with the main land, and any of the islands can also be connected for less than one thousand dollars, by means of floating bridges, which will give an opportunity for driving the stock off, in case of an anticipated flood, of which, by the means of the telegraph, there will be a week's notice, at least.

This land is practically inexhaustible; it is like farming a manure deposit twenty feet in depth—if the top should ever become exhausted, all that will be necessary will be to plow a little deeper and turn up a fresh portion of manure.

The question is frequently asked, what would be the effect of a flood on these lands? As before stated, the actual injury would be very little; but for the sake of argument, we will take Twitchell Island and suppose that the future will be like the past in respect to floods—in the past nineteen years we have had two floods that would have risen over the top of the present levees; we will also suppose that these two floods will destroy all the levees, improvements, etc., on the Island, all of which could now be built for five dollars per acre. As previously stated these floods subside in February, the levee could be rebuilt during March and April, and the crops could be sown in May and June—as all the land under cultivation on this island this year averaged $36 per acre net profit, it is absurd to suppose that any damage caused by a flood would not be repaired immediately, when the cost of doing so is so little in proportion to the profit.

The remark is frequently made that this being a dry year is a favorable one for these lands; this is partially a mistake, as the only advantage a dry over a wet year, is that the produce sells for more—the yield being the same every year.

In conclusion, these lands have a rich, inexhaustible, and most productive soil, which will never suffer from drought, as they can be irrigated at pleasure; a pleasant and healthful climate, and the cheapest freight from any farming lands to San Francisco. These qualities and advantages will in a short time make them the most valuable farming lands on this coast.

HOW TO OBTAIN LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The question is often asked, How can lands be obtained in California?

To answer this question intelligently, and in a manner to be of some practical benefit to the readers of the Mail Bag, is the object of this epistle.

In the first place, a large portion of the best and most available lands of the State were granted by the Mexican Government to individuals prior to the conquest of this country, which, by the terms of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, were respected where the grants were proved to be genuine. In many cases, however, by careful manipulations, large tracts have been confirmed where the grants are not believed to have been legitimate. Many of these grants, either in whole or in part, can be purchased from the grant owners at a fair price.

In the second place, the lands remaining after the survey and segregation of the Mexican grants belong to the United States Government with such exceptions as will be hereafter noted. These lands can be obtained in several ways:

First. By purchase at $1 25 per acre in green-backs or soldiers' warrants, or Agricultural College scrip, where the townships have been surveyed or sectionized, and the land offered for sale at public auction and not sold.

Second. By homestead entries on lands that have been surveyed by Government, by residing on and cultivating the same for five years, and paying to the Land Office some $25, thereby securing 160 acres.

Third. By preëmption, on lands surveyed or non-surveyed, by residing thereon and making the necessary improvements and cultivation. When the township in which the land is situated shall be surveyed, then the party preëmpting has three months after the plat of survey is deposited in the Land Office in which to file his intentions to preëmpt, and within eighteen months to prove up his settlement and cultivation and pay $1 25 per acre to the Government for 160 acres, as above.

In portions of the State railroad reservations have attached, and within their limits the land (even numbered sections) are held as double minimum, or at $2 50 per acre.

Within the limits of these reservations only eighty acres can be taken as a homestead; but soldiers who have served in the wars since 1855 can take 160 acres within the reservation as a homestead. The Congress of the United States have made several grants of land to the State of California:

First. A grant of 500,000 acres for internal improvement purposes, but by a clause in our Constitution, which was recognized by Congress, this grant was changed to the Public School Fund.

The Legislature of California authorized the issue of School Land warrants for this grant, which, to the extent of some 250,000 acres, were sold to individuals at $2 per acre, and the balance of the grant was sold at $1 25 per acre. A few of these School Land warrants are on the market, selling at from $2 50 to $3 per acre, as they are required. They can be located on any surveyed lands outside of railroad reservations in parcels of not less than 320 acres.

Second. Congress granted to the State the 16th and 36th sections in each township, equal to one-eighteenth of the land of the State, for school purposes, with the proviso that where these sections are included in private grants or are preempted previously to the survey of the township, or are wanting, other lands may be taken in lieu thereof.

The "Lieu Lands," as they are called, have in the main been sold, so that no entries of that kind can now be made.

There are, however, a great many sections 16 and 36 still to be sold, as the townships are surveyed or sectionized.

It may be necessary to say that a township contains 36 sections of one mile square each, or 640 acres.

The 16th section is one of the center sections, and the 36th section is the south-east corner section invariably. These School Lands have been and are sold at 1 25 per acre in gold coin.

Third. Congress has also granted to the State 150,000 acres for an Agricultural College.

This land can be entered in any township that has been surveyed by Government, and on even numbered sections inside railroad reservations, by paying the Government $1 25 per acre extra; and also in quantities of 40 acres.

Having these privileges, the Regents of the College charge $5 per acre outside, and $6 25 per acre inside said reservations.

Congress has also granted to the State 72 sections of land for Seminary purposes, and 12 sections for public buildings. These lands have long since been sold.

Fourth. Congress has also granted to the State the swamp and overflowed lands, amounting in the aggregate to several millions of acres.

These lands are sold as they are wanted at $1 per acre, which is returned to pay the expense of reclamation, as it is performed.

From the foregoing it will be seen that there is an abundance of land in the State, and many and various facilities for acquiring it.

MARBLE.

The very word is suggestive of beauty, and although the meaning is more limited to-day than in the middle ages, yet it still signifies art, ornament, and decoration. Formerly all polished stone, whether porphyry, granite, malachite, or limestone was called marble. Thus the marbles of Egypt were talked about, whereas they are polished porphyry, and hence came the saying, "as hard and enduring as marble." To-day the word marble is strictly confined to a granular, semi-crystalline, carbonate of lime, which, in its pure state is perfectly white, but forms marble of many beautiful colors or admixture of colors when some foreign substance or element is present. Perfectly pure white marble, free from vein or blemish, almost ranks with the precious stones, and it is of this species of marble that we would now speak. In what is termed the Duchy of Modena, about two miles from the Mediterranean, is the valley of Carrara, from which the city takes its name. The sides of this valley are lined with marble, more or less pure. The imagination might create a hillside of dazzling white, relieved here and there by the dark foliage of the myrtle or olive, but such is not the case. The walls of the valley, especially at Monte Sagro, where the great quarries are situated, are rent and excavated by the work of man for past ages, and to-day, at the principal quarry, that of Torano, twelve hundred men are employed daily. For here it is that the famous Carrara marble is found. From this valley, that which has been fashioned into the greatest beauty of form and grandeur of monument has been taken, and in many instances the art and intellect of remote cycles have by its means become known and imperishable. For it is a well known fact that the purer the marble the longer it lasts. Pure carbonate of lime is not affected by weather, hence it is that the antique statues remain in their present perfect condition, and man has done more to destroy them than nature or time. We have been led to make these remarks by witnessing the arrival, a day or two ago, of some very large blocks of pure Carrara marble, which we followed to the workshops of Messrs. Heverin & Co., on Jackson street, near Montgomery. We entered, and Mr. Heverin showed us all over his establishment. Some few years since, the late John Sime, wishing to encourage that branch of industry, gave Mr. Heverin ten thousand dollars with which to proceed to Carrara and make himself thoroughly acquainted with the various qualities of marble, at the same time make arrangements for a continued supply of the purest quality that could be procured. Mr. Heverin went to Italy, studied the various quarries, made the necessary arrangements, and the result was, that the yards and storehouses on Jackson street have been regularly filled with elegantly carved mantles, some of them remarkably rich and handsome, with statuary, with sculptured monuments for tombs, and marble ornaments for buildings, etc. We particularly noticed some beautiful plinths that had just been imported, and many of our readers may remember that lovely statuette of a nymph, which was on exhibition at the last Mechanics' Fair. This, and many other works of art, are to be found at Mr. Heverin's. Another branch of industry connected with the marble trade was also inaugurated by this house. Formerly marble slabs of various thickness were cut in Italy, labor there being so much cheaper than in San Francisco. The new tariff, however, imposed a duty per superficial foot, so that each slab was taxed alike, whatever its thickness or thinness; whereupon Mr. Heverin directed his agents to send out the marble in large blocks, and at once sent to work and constructed a cutting mill, attached to his yard. We visited it, and saw the huge blocks being gradually sliced into slabs of various thickness. The machinery is driven by an engine of sixty-horse power. The whole block is cut at once, by so many saws at different distances apart. The marble is afterwards made smooth upon a revolving polishing table, and its final lustre is given by pumice stone. A visit to these works is quite interesting as well as edifying. Mr. Gagliada, an Italian, is the Superintendent, and the encouragement Mr. Heverin has met with is an evidence of the good taste and luxury of the people of San Francisco. The establishment is now employed upon a splendid mausoleum to the memory of Don Abel Stearns, of Los Angeles.

THE OYSTER TRADE.

For a long time it was deemed an impossibility to obtain Eastern Oysters in this city—at all events in any quantities—but the energy, perseverance, and untiring industry of Mr. Emerson Corville, of the Saddle Rock Oyster House, on Pine street, has removed every obstacle, and this delicious bivalve is now to be obtained, with all the other native varieties, at the above establishment. Good articles, civil waiters and first-class cooks always please the public: hence Mr. Corville's success.

TO INDIA IN FIVE DAYS.

The Times says another attempt to solve the problem of direct railway communication between England and India has just been made by Messrs. William Low and George Thomas, of Wrexham and Cardiff. Under the form of a letter to Mr. Gladstone, these gentlemen have published an outline of their plan, and it deserves the attentive consideration of the public. The route now open between England and India which admits of making the journey in the shortest time is that by way of Brindisi, Alexandria and Suez to Kurrachee or Bombay. The absolute distance is greater than by the route from Marseilles to Alexandria, but the advantage gained from the greater length of the railway portion more than compensates in time for the increased distance that is traveled. The whole journey is supposed to take twenty days, although it is seldom actually completed within this limit. The proposal of Messrs. Low and Thomas is to make use of existing lines of railway and the Mont Cenis Tunnel to Trieste, and thence to construct a railroad through Austria, European and Asiatic Turkey, Persia and Beloochistan to Kurrachee, and onward to Bombay. The total distance from London to Kurrachee would be 5,311 miles by rail and 28 miles (the Straits of Dover) by sea. At a uniform rate of 10½ miles an hour by water and 40 miles an hour by land, the journey from end to end would be accomplished in 5 days, 16 hours, 46 minutes. Calculating the railway traveling at 30 miles an hour, the time would be 7 days, 13 hours, 22 minutes; and at 50 miles an hour, 4 days, 10 hours and 13 minutes. Of the total length of line required, nearly one-fourth (1,170 miles) is already constructed. The highest estimated cost of the undertaking is in round numbers 41 millions sterling, and the estimated cost per mile ranges from £8,000 to £17,000 in different localities. The gross estimate for the several sections is as follows:

In Austria.....	£6,545,000
In Turkey in Europe.....	7,224,000
Steam ferry across Bosphorus.....	100,000
In Turkey in Asia.....	14,670,000
In Persia.....	6,840,000
In Beloochistan.....	8,392,000
In Scinde.....	184,000
Total.....	£40,955,000

The authors suggest that the cost of construction should be borne not by one nation only, but by all through which the line would pass, and they assume that to bring the 175 millions of India within five days' journey of England would be a source of enormous through traffic, as well as of traffic between various intermediate points. The authors are fully persuaded of the feasibility of the plan for constructing a submarine tunnel between England and France, and believe that such a work is likely to be accomplished.—Leeds Mercury September 23d, 1871.

THE FINE ARTS.

We notice with much pleasure that the well-known firm of Bradley & Rulofson met with their usual and deserved success at the late Mechanics' Fair, being awarded all the first premiums for portrait photography. We are not surprised at the decision of the Committee on Premiums, as we had anticipated their verdict.

THE GEYSERS OF CALIFORNIA.

We find, by the Sonoma County papers, that at a late meeting of the Board of Supervisors at Santa Rosa, the propositions of the San Francisco and Northern Pacific Railroad were accepted and adopted by the Board, viz.: the Company will complete the railroad from Healdsburg to Cloverdale, some sixteen miles, as provided for by the vote of the county, and before the first of May next, the time specified by law, and for which the Board will issue the county bonds of $5,000 per mile. In this connection is included the transportation of freight and passengers to and from the line of the railroad, improvements in which the county and railroad are alike interested, one of which becomes a necessity by the completion of the road to Cloverdale—that is, a substantial bridge across the Russian River, to accommodate the travel and freight of an extensive section of country, whose produce in the cereals, sulphur, borax, timber, etc., is comparatively shut out from commercial competition; and to open a short and easy route to the Geyser Springs, toward which the railroad company have agreed to donate to the county a certain amount of bonds. A short road to the Geysers is a sine qua non, as hitherto California's greatest curiosity could only be reached through tedious, not to say dangerous roads. The new road will bring the Geysers within twelve miles of the cars at Cloverdale, through an easy, safe grade, opening a charming region to the traveler, the hunter, and old Izaak Walton's disciples. The expenses of the trip will be greatly lessened, and the ladies will be pleased to learn that the difficulty of transporting large trunks, for a varied toilet and lengthened stay, will no longer exist. The public will be enabled to leave San Francisco in the morning and take their afternoon lunch at the Springs. Clear Lake, and a beautiful region of country and streams, will be brought by new roads within easy traveling distance to the Geysers. Dépôt buildings, erected with the view of an extensive freight and passenger business, will be placed at various prominent points on the route from Petaluma to Cloverdale, and the effects of what a railroad will do for a county is already developing itself in the location of new towns along the route—but our readers have long been acquainted with our sentiments on the subject of railroads.

INDUSTRY REWARDED.

---

It is with great pleasure that we have again to chronicle the success which always attends industry and perseverance. We allude to the fact of Mr. C. E. Watkins receiving the only award, a silver medal, for the best views of California scenery and photographic landscapes at the Eighth Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute. We have elsewhere considered it our duty to criticise some of the actions of the awarding committee at the late Mechanics' Fair, but in the present instance we feel bound to indorse them in selecting Mr. Watkins as deserving the premium over all other competing photographers—superiority in the art of photography; moderation in prices; gentlemanly and lady-like attendants, and last, but not least, an obliging and courteous principal, cannot fail to have their influence with the public, who, while they willingly pay their money for an article, sometimes will consider themselves entitled to common civility in return. Mr. Watkins' large and increasing business has induced him to move from his present location to the galleries lately occupied by Messrs. Dames & Williams, 26 Montgomery street, where he intends to carry on his present business of photographic scenic artist, and to enlarge it by introducing portrait photography, in which branch Mr. Dames will assist. This combination will, no doubt, insure to Mr. Watkins the high reputation of excelling in all the branches of his profession. We have paid a visit to the new premises which are now undergoing extensive alterations and improvements, and we were not surprised to find that Mr. Watkins' artistic talents are not alone confined to his profession, but that his ideas for decorating his new business residence promise to eclipse in their execution anything of the sort ever seen in this city. Due notice will be given of the opening of this gallery.

Hotel Expenses and Cost of Living in San Francisco.

Now that a portion of the current of travel from China and Australasia to the United States and Europe has been diverted into a new channel by the establishment of regular steam communication, it would interest many to know the very moderate expenses incurred either in passing through or in sojourning a while in the city of San Francisco. We give, therefore, a brief statement of them, leaving the traveler to compare them with that of other places. In no city in the world is hotel accommodation of the same excellence to be obtained at so moderate a price. At the Occidental and Grand Hotels and at the Lick House unsurpassed board with comfortable quarters can be obtained for three dollars per diem. At the Cosmopolitan, one of the finest hotels in the United States, and at the Russ House, the expense is somewhat lower; while at the American Exchange and International Hotel board and lodging, with excellent table, can be had for from one dollar and a half to two dollars a day. If the traveler desires to economize, he can obtain a good bed-room for from three to four dollars per week, and can get meals at restaurants for from fifteen to fifty cents each, according to the dishes he selects. He can thus measure his wants by the length of his purse, and yet always obtain clean, well-cooked meals at a less cost than any city we have ever visited, either in the United States or Great Britain. To those who prefer a more lengthened stay and purpose going into housekeeping, we would say that provisions are very moderate in price: Beef, from 12 to 18 cents per pound, according to the joint; mutton, 10 to 12 cents; lamb, 12 to 15 cents; veal, 12 to 18 cents; pork, 12 to 15 cents; bacon, 20 cents; butter, 40 to 50 cents; flour, $1 50 to $2 per sack of 50 pounds; potatoes, 1½ to 3 cents per pound. All vegetables are cheap; when not in season there is, of course, an advance. Milk is 10 cents a quart; eggs, 40 cents per dozen. Dairy produce and poultry are the only things which rate higher than in the Eastern States. Of the fruits, they are at times in such abundance as hardly to pay the expense of bringing them to market. A six-roomed house in a respectable locality may be rented for from $20 to $25 per month and upward; one with eight or ten rooms, for $40; ten to twelve rooms, from $60. Traveling to and from suburban residences is not very expensive, however, car tickets being from 3 to 6½ cents each, and ferriage across the bay, to the most beautiful environs in the world, from 10 cents to 25. This, we think, concludes our list of necessities for a life in San Francisco. It is a city in which a man or a family may live as extravagantly as they may please, but where they can practice economy if they choose.

Precaution Against the Infection of Cholera in England.

The ravages of cholera in Eastern Europe and its onward stride westward has called forth from the Medical Department of the Privy Council of Great Britain the following:

1. As Asiatic cholera is now prevailing in foreign ports within a week's voyage of this country, and may probably extend to others which have still quicker communication with England, it is not unlikely that, within the next month or two, occasional cases of the disease may be brought into the ports of this country.

2. A recent order of council, dated July 29th, has given power to the respective local authorities to deal with any such cases, if they arrive, in a way to protect the population, as far as practicable, against surprise. But as cases of choleraic infection have innumerable degrees of severity, it is possible that some such cases, slightly affected, will, notwithstanding the vigilance of local authorities, be landed without particular notice in English sea-board towns, whence then they may advance to other, and, perhaps, inland places.

3. Former experience of cholera in England justifies a belief that the presence of imported cases of the disease at various spots in the country will not be capable of causing much injury to the population if the places receiving the infection have had the advantage of proper sanitary administration; and, in order that all local populations may make their self-defense as effective as they can, it will be well for them to have regard to the present state of knowledge concerning the mode in which epidemics of cholera (at least in this country) are produced.

4. Happily for mankind cholera is so little contagious, in the sense in which small-pox and scarlatina are commonly called contagious, that, if reasonable care be taken where it is present, there is scarcely any risk that the disease will spread to persons who nurse and otherwise closely attend upon the sick. But cholera has a certain peculiar infectiveness of its own, which, where local conditions assist, can operate with terrible force, and at considerable distances from the sick. It is characteristic of cholera, not only of the disease in its developed and alarming form, but equally of the slightest diarrhoea which the epidemic influences can cause, that all matters which the patient discharges from his stomach and bowels are infective, and that, if they be left without disinfection after they are discharged, their infectiveness during some days gradually grows stronger and stronger. Probably, under ordinary circumstances the patient has no power of infecting other persons except by means of these discharges; nor any power of infecting even by them, except in so far as particles of them are enabled to taint the food, water, or air which people consume. Thus, when a case of cholera is imported into any place the disease is not likely to spread unless in proportion as it finds, locally open to it, certain facilities for spreading by indirect infection. In order rightly to appreciate what these facilities must be, the following considerations must be borne in mind: First, that any choleraic discharge cast without previous thorough disinfection into any cesspool or drain, or other depository or conduit of filth, infects the excremental matters with which it there mingles, and probably to some extent the effluvia which those matters evolve; secondly, that the infective power of choleraic discharges attached to whatever bedding, clothing, towels and like things, have been imbued with them, and renders those things, if not thoroughly disinfected, as capable of spreading the disease in places to which they are sent (for washing or other purposes) as, in like circumstances, the cholera patient himself would be; thirdly, that if by leakage or soakage from cesspools or drains, or through reckless casting out of slops and wash-water, any taint, however small, of the infective material gets access to wells or other sources of drinking water, it imparts to enormous volumes of water the power of propagating the disease. When due regard is had to these possibilities of indirect infection, there will be no difficulty in understanding that even a single case of cholera, perhaps of the slightest degree, and perhaps quite unsuspected in its neighborhood, may, if local circumstances coöperate, exert a terribly infective power on considerable masses of population.

5. It might be supposed that under those provisions of the Sanitary Act, 1866, which relate to precautions against dangerous infections of disease, security could be taken, as regards the infective discharges of cholera, against various kinds of personal conduct, which would be dangerous to the public health; above all, that, under those provisions or otherwise, the universal disinfection of such discharges could be enforced. Undoubtedly, everything possible in this direction ought to be done, wherever a case of cholera is known to exist; too much importance cannot be attached to the precaution of thoroughly disinfecting, without delay, all discharges from the stomach and bowels of persons suffering under the disease, as well as all bedding, clothing, towels, and the like, which such discharges may have imbued; and, of course, neither choleraic discharges, nor any stops which may contain traces of them, should ever (even when supposed to be disinfected) be cast into any position from which they may get access into drinking water. The duty of observing those precautions is one which ought never to be neglected; but populations cannot prudently stake their lives on the chance that it will be completely fulfilled for them. Apart from all question of negligence, the degrees of cholera are too many, and the slight and incipient cases far too apt to escape observation, for any such defense against its infection to be more than partial. And the main object for endeavor must be to secure such local circumstances that cholera-contagium, though not disinfected, shall be unable to act extensively on the population.

6. The dangers which have to be guarded against as favoring the spread of cholera-contagium are particularly two. First, and above all, there is the danger of water supplies which are in any (even in the slightest) degree tainted by house refuse or other like kinds of filth, as where there is outflow, leakage, or filtration from sewers, house drains, privies, cesspools, foul ditches, or the like into streams, springs, wells, or reservoirs from which the supply of water is drawn, or into the soil in which the wells are situated—a danger which may exist on a small scale (but, perhaps, often repeated in the same district) at the pump or dip-well of a private house, or on a large and even vast scale in the source of supply of public water-works. And, secondly, there is the danger of breathing air which is foul with effluvia from the same sorts of impurity. Information as to the high degree in which these two dangers affect the public health in ordinary times, and as to the special importance which attaches to them at times when any diarrheal infection is likely to be introduced, has now for so many years been before the public, that the improved systems of refuse-removal and water supply by which the dangers are permanently obviated for large populations, and also the minor structural improvements by which separate households are secured against the dangers, ought long ago to have come into universal use. So far, however, as this wiser course has not been adopted, temporary security must, as far as practicable, be sought in measures of a palliative kind. (a.) Immediate and searching examination of sources of water supply should be made in all cases where the source is in any degree open to the suspicion of impurity, and the water both from private and public sources should be examined. Where pollution is discovered, everything practicable should be done to prevent the pollution from continuing, or, if this object cannot be attained to prevent the water from being drunk. (b.) Simultaneously, there should be immediate thorough removal of every sort of house-refuse and other filth which has accumulated in neglected places; future accumulations of the same sort should be prevented; attention should be given to all defects of house-drains and sinks through which offensive smells are let into houses, thorough washing and lime-washing of uncleanly premises, especially of such as are densely occupied, should be practiced again and again. (c.) Disinfection should be very freely and very frequently employed in and round about houses, wherever there are receptacles or conduits of filth, wherever there is filth-sodden porous earth, wherever anything else, in or under or about the house tends to make the atmosphere foul. In the absence of permanent safeguards no approach to security can be got without incessant cleansings and disinfections, or without extreme and constant vigilance against every possible contamination of drinking water.

7. In view of any possibility that the infection of cholera may again be present in this country, it is desirable that in each locality the public should ascertain to whom it practically has to look, in case of need, for its collective safety against such dangers as the above. The responsibility is, in a large proportion of cases, mixed. The most critical of all its branches, the responsibility of providing for the unpollutedness of water supplies, is, in many very important places, in the hands of commercial companies; and it is to be hoped that these companies, informed, as they must be, of the calamitous influence which some of their number have exerted in previous epidemics of cholera, will remember, if the disease should again be present here, that each of them, in its daily distribution of water has hundreds or even thousands of human lives in its hands. But, except to that extent, the responsibility for local defenses against the cholera, both as regards water supply and as regards local cleanliness and refuse removal, is vested in the local authorities—the sewer authorities and nuisance authorities of recent statutes. These authorities—the town councils, improvement commissioners, local district boards, boards of guardians, and select and common vestries, of their respective areas of jurisdiction—are all, either electively or directly, so constituted as to represent the will of the local rate-paying population; and each such population has had almost absolute means of deciding for itself whether the district which it inhabits shall be wholesomely or unwholesomely kept. It is greatly to be wished that the former of these alternatives had from long ago been the desire of every local constituency in the country. It may fairly be believed that in considerable parts of the country conditions favorable to the spread of cholera are far less abundant than at former times of visitation; but it is certain that in very many places the conditions of security are wholly or almost wholly absent; and it is to be hoped that, in all this large class of cases, the authorities, under present circumstances, will do everything which in the remaining time can be done, to justify the trust reposed in them by the legislature for the protection of the public health.

8. It is important for the public very distinctly to remember that pains taken and costs incurred for the purposes to which this memorandum refers cannot in any event be regarded as wasted trouble and expense. The local conditions which would enable cholera, if imported, to spread its infection in this country are conditions which day by day, in the absence of cholera, create and spread other diseases—diseases which, as being never absent from the country, are, in the long run, far more destructive than cholera; and the sanitary improvements which would justify a sense of security against any apprehended importation of cholera would, to their extent, though cholera should never reappear in England, give amply remunerative results in the prevention of those other diseases.

By direction of the Lords of the Council,

(Signed) JOHN SIMON.

The Coming Plague.

With long gaunt strides and solemn face, the cholera proposes to look in upon us once more after his last journey round the world, and give us a shake of his long bony skeleton fingers. We are not glad to see his old familiar face—we do not invite him to go out of his way to call upon us—in fact we would give him the cold shoulder if we could, but as he seems to be inevitable, let us make the best of it. Let us put our house in order to receive him. Let us clean up and put chloride of lime over our parlor floors, so that when the old Indian gets along here he will find us swept and garnished for an honored guest. He is like a mother-in-law or poor relation, entitled to make us an occasional visit, and when we once know that there is no escape from this visit, let us do our best to give him a cheerful welcome, and introduce him into our best society. Let us by over politeness make his stay so uncomfortable that he will not tarry long with us. This wicked old Asiatic has spent all his life in a sultry climate, amid tangled jungles and burning suns. When he gets among us our cold daily winds will strike a chill to the very marrow of his bones. He has been accustomed to live with dirty people, crowded together in narrow streets. We have no tenement houses in which to lodge him—no sweltering, festering, undrained locality where he can hide. We will drown him out with Spring Valley water—sweep him away with our west winds. Let him come—if necessary we will get up a carnival to welcome him, as the Parisians once did. We will give him an illumination and a grand procession. At all events, he need not think to frighten us, for we are up to that old trick. We learned it of him when he visited us before. Then he frightened us, and fright is his strongest weapon. We do not propose to get scared or to run, but just squarely to face him down and say to the old bugbear that we do not propose to lie down and die till we know what is the matter with us. We have one advantage over him this time. When he was in San Francisco, before it was in 1850; we were living in ships and tents, sleeping on the ground in the open air. We had just come in from long voyages around the Horn, or through the tropics or across the plains. He found us weak and feverish, and even then he only obtained a few score of victims. Now all are better prepared for him; all are clean and strong and healthy; all sleep in beds and have enough to eat, and we defy and laugh at him; he must come over land by railroad now if he gets here at all, and by the time he has crossed the plains, drank alkali water, mounted to the pure air of the Sierras, he will be about used up; besides, he is getting late, and when winter fairly sets in we will quarantine him up in the snows and freeze his very life-blood out of him. We are inclined to think, too, that this is his last journey away from home. By the time he gets back to India from this trip he will have his hands full. The English Doctors are after him all through Hindostan, and every time he goes abroad he gets weaker and weaker. This is your last visit, old fellow, so make the most of it. We are older and wiser and braver than when before you poked your dirty, hateful form among us. We will take an even bet you do not find as many victims on this trip as you voted the Bell-ringer ticket. We have beat George Gorham, and we are not afraid to tackle the cholera.

— The familiar old statistical reformer is come to us again with his figures and his philosophy. This time he is a Belgian physician, and his special horror is tobacco. With that charming disregard of sense which is so characteristic of his class, he traces the relation between the annual production of the Indian weed and the annual crop of lunatics—neglecting to include himself, however. He shows that insanity is intimately connected with the tobacco yield—grows with its growth and strengthens with its strength. His figures make it clear that there is one lunatic to twenty-eight hundred kilogrammes of the weed. We do not deny that the gentleman's figures are accurate, nor do we seek to cast discredit upon his theory, but in behalf of his co-workers in the field of cold water idiocy we beg him to go slow. If all the insanity is to be caused by tobacco, the temperance movement will have lost its most potent argument. If tipping is to be accredited with only a beggarly array of murders, knavery, orphans, dirt, general squalor and miscellaneous unpleasantness—if it can in no wise claim dominion over the wits, and is powerless to dethrone the reason, what are the temperance lecturers to do for bread-and-butter? It is hardly fair for the tobacco sharp to take the favoring breeze out of the sails of these reformatory wind-mills!

Railway Bonds in the German Market.

The North Pacific Railway Company, whose road is now in course of construction, have put their bonds in the Frankfort market. The capitalists of Frankfort have commissioned one of their most eminent citizens, Mr. Otto Von Breitschwert, to visit America for the purpose of inspecting this road, examining the laws as applying to its bonds, etc.; also to confer with the Stockholders and Directors of the Company. While on his way hither, Mr. Otto Von B—— stopped at Duluth, on Lake Superior, at present the western terminus of the road; he was there received by the representatives of the Company, and in response to their hearty welcome, spoke thus: "I thank you for your kind remembrance of the German Press. In a Convention of German journalists, assembled at Frankfort, I had the honor to speak of the American Press. I was proud to speak in its highest praise; especially had I to eulogize its spirit of advocating assistance and subsidies to railroads. I am proud my countrymen sympathized with you during the late rebellion; the German people purchased the United States bonds during the dark days of that period, when all other European nations predicted the speedy destruction of the American Union. The German heart beats for you, and is with you in your advancements, believes in you and your institutions. What I have seen in America has astonished me. I have seen large cities built as though in a day; I have seen your magnificent rivers, upon which the unequalled product of the land is transported; I have seen the marvelous works of a most ingenious people; I have studied your administration, which is new in the history of nations, being the direct exponent of the free will of the people. I have studied your whole system of government, and in its liberal and expansive nature and capacity, have discovered the key to that mystery of the marshaling from the ranks of peaceful citizens in an incredibly short time one of the mightiest armies the world ever saw; while in contrast, we, of the German Fatherland, are compelled to be both citizens and soldiers." Mr. Otto Von Breitschwert is at present in San Francisco. We trust his report as Commissioner from the Frankfort capitalists will be succeeded by a speedy completion of the Great Northern Pacific Railroad.—Translated from the Abend Post.

— The other day a man named Harris persuaded his wife to go to the market for a steak, and took a mean advantage of her absence by blowing the top of his head off. The incident was related in the newspapers of course—as it never should have been. "Why?" We will show you why: The next morning the Town Crier picked up his regular Alta, and unsuspiciously read that item aloud, little thinking of the effect upon the mind of his wife, who seemed to have her whole soul absorbed in various nameless household cares. All that day she was thoughtful and reticent. Next morning, when the Town Crier arose, there was no breakfast prepared. There was a howling fire in the range, and the plates were laid, but there was nothing to eat. Just as the T. C. was about to remonstrate with an ax-handle, the angel of the fireside appeared, hooded and shawled, with a market basket on her arm. "Toonie, dear," said she, "there isn't a bite of meat in the house. I'm going to market, and it is uncertain when I shall return. Good bye, darling, you have been a good drinker, and may God reward you for it!" And with a meaning look she laid a loaded Derringer on the sideboard and went out. Then, for the first time in twenty-four hours, the T. C. thought of the poor fellow who had shot the top of his head off. It was intended that he should think of him.

— Heaven help us! the Bulletin is inaugurating another European war. It has the plans already well matured, and the contest is to be commensurate with their magnitude. Beside this gigantic unpleasantness, the late bickering between Germany and France is to appear an interchange of courtesies. Let the Bulletin reflect before it plunges Europe into a comprehensive riot. If it cannot remove the firebrand from its tail, let it not jump recklessly into the standing grain of the old world, but limit its incendiary energy to the dry stubble of local politics. Let it not without provocation smite the European Philistines with its jawbone! Does our neighbor remember what he was doing a little more than a year ago? Do you, Bulletin? "No!" Sir, you were hotly conducting an European war. You were leading the hosts of France across the Rhine, to despoil the villages and the fair fields of Germany. You were planning countless battles upon Prussian soil. You were dictating terms of peace to the prostrate Teut, and counseling the fiery Gaul to moderation. Dear Bulletin, will you be warned not to meddle with European politics, and inaugurate European wars, or will you compel us to make you the laughing stock of the town by reprinting your editorials of a year ago? There is matter here, neighbor, for serious reflection.

— Mrs. Cassandra Holland, who died last month in Maryland, was one hundred and sixteen years of age. From the great number of these very mature persons who have lately been dropping off, we infer that the Angel of Death has, for some years, been shirking his duty, and has recently received an intimation that he would better sober up and get to work. For our own part, we have no objection to his "loafing about the Throne,"—along with the other feathered idlers, winged inutilities, flying Dutchmen, chicken-women, etc.

Shapes of a Soul.

White with the starlight folded in its wings,
 And nestling timidly against your love,
 At this soft time of hush'd and glimmering things,
 You call my soul a dove, a snowy dove.
 If I shall ask you in some shining hour,
 When bees and odors through the clear air pass,
 You'll say my soul buds as a small flush'd flower,
 Far off, half-hiding, in the old home-grass.
 Ah, pretty names for pretty moods; and you,
 Who love me, such sweet shapes as these can see;
 But, take it from its sphere of bloom and dew,
 And where will then your bird or blossom be?
 Could you but see it, by life's torrid light,
 Crouch in its sands and glare with fire-red wrath,
 My soul would seem a tiger, fierce and bright,
 Among the trembling passions in its path.
 And, could you sometimes watch it coil and slide,
 And drag its colors through the dust awhile,
 And hiss its poison under-foot, and hide,
 My soul would seem a snake—Ah, do not smile!
 Yet fiercer forms and darker it can wear;
 No matter, though, when these are of the past,
 If as a lamb in the Good Shepherd's care
 By the still waters it lie down at last.

Remarkable Invention.

In the London central telegraph station one of the most important duties to be performed is that of collecting, numbering and re-distributing the messages which are received from and for every conceivable place in the United Kingdom and abroad. A message, for instance, from Brighton would be received in the new or west wing of the building, and if for Leeds or Bradford, or Edinburgh or Glasgow, would have to be carried by hand into the main portion of the "provincial gallery"—a distance probably of fifty yards; and in the same way messages from the whole of the south or west of England, for the northern and midland counties, for Scotland, Ireland and the metropolis would have to be carried or blown by pneumatic agency from one portion to another. To remedy this as much as possible there has just been introduced into the Central Telegraph Station a most interesting and ingenious adaptation of the system of feeding and delivering from a newspaper printing machine. Sets of endless tapes revolving in pulleys, and arranged so as to snatch the unfolded message form firmly between them have been fitted between the different floors and rooms of the building, and are now in full operation for the purpose of collecting and re-distributing telegrams. The rotary motion is constant and unremitting, so that the tapes are available for carrying in either direction, and as rapidly as the messages can be fed into them. The great advantage over hand collecting is that the service is continuous, and that messages, instead of being allowed to accumulate in lots of three and four are sent in singly, one after another, as fast as they reach the feeding table. The facility with which the tapes snatch up the messages, and the precision with which they deliver them is truly remarkable; while the constant stream of messages up, down, across, and overhead is a very interesting and pretty sight. The working cost is merely nominal, power being derived from an engine already in use in connection with the pneumatic system, and from the peculiar motion of the tapes they, so to speak, act the part of driving bands, and are thus to a large extent self-sustaining.

— It is with deep and universal regret that we announce the death of our esteemed fellow-citizen, Dr. Livingstone. This melancholy event has come upon the country like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky. Had the doctor borne a charmed life his death could not have provoked greater astonishment and vexation. Up to yesterday noon, the village physician at Ijiji was perfectly confident that he would recover, although the pestilential climate of Soudan had considerably worried him, and had proved fatal to his faithful and attached hippopotamus. At about one o'clock, however, he began to fail rapidly, and by five there was nothing left of him at Ijiji, though he was still prevalent in several regions to the southward, and the vicinity of Gebel-el-Cumri was pervaded with him in considerable quantity. But by seven, advices came from Dahomey that he was dead in that section, by eight he had perished all along the upper Nile, by nine had faded and gone from Beled-el-Jered, and before daylight this morning the returns were all in, and Dr. Livingstone, the great African explorer, was no more forever! The obsequies will take place at Booriboola-Gha as soon as all the remains can be concentrated at that point. In its deep affliction science has our heartiest sympathy, and we cheerfully condole with everybody.

Indecent Journalism.

We propose to say a few plain words to that portion of the inhabitants of San Francisco who preserve the outward forms of common decency concerning the streams of unpleasantness that are flowing daily through their families in the channels furnished by our two minor dailies. (We believe that is the correct expression to be used when one wishes to allude to the Call and Chronicle without being coarsely direct.) Two years ago the Call was a harmless, imbecile sort of publication, provoking no deeper feeling in the community than indifference, while the natural tendency of the Chronicle to obscenity was restrained by the numerous prosecutions, fines and imprisonments to which the editor of the Mazeppa (another indecent sheet) was subjected. About a year ago, however, the editor of that paper was shot and dangerously wounded, and was afterward compelled to suspend his publication, since which time the Chronicle, followed closely by its imitator, the Call, has been descending, weekly, toward the level occupied by the departed iniquity, until it is a matter of surprise that the law for the suppression of improper publications has not been put in force against it. We are well aware that the publication of these facts will have a tendency to increase the circulation of the journals in question, on the Barbary Coast and in other places inhabited by a similar class of persons, and as that is the kind of patronage for which they are evidently striving, we trust that, should they receive a sudden accession to their subscription list from those quarters, their gratitude to the News Letter will be proportionate. The proprietors of these papers publish every Sunday what they facetiously call a family edition. For example, the Chronicle of the last two or three Sundays contains the following choice selections, to be read immediately after family prayers, we presume: "A Modest Policeman in an Embarrassing Situation," "Dr. Mary Walker's Breeches," "Babyless Wives," "Free Love in Pioche," "Meditations of an Eccentric Grass Widow on Embroidered Chemises," "A Pig Baby" (a sickening article), "Seduction," "Chloroform," "Stomach Pumps," "Rape by a Negro," etc. While the Call, less prurient but more sensational, presented to our wives and daughters, "Pictures of Misery and Crime," "A Haunted House," "A Fatal Quarrel," "On the Town," "A Deadly Hearing," and so on, column after column, ad nauseam; a single page of the issue of August 18th being graced with the following sensational headings: "A Dreadful Death," "A Baby Dies of Hydrophobia," "Barks Like a Dog," "Foams at the Mouth," "A Horrible Story," "A Fearful Tragedy," "A Fiendish Murder," "An Infant Burned Up in a Kitchen Stove," "A Child Killed by its Father," "A Much Abused Man" (very coarse); "A Wounded Lunatic," etc. Nice page, don't it? We say nothing of the bosh which appears in their columns concerning the dress and appearance of our citizens, as it is not positively vicious, but simply silly, its worst effect being to subject the persons so written about to the suspicion of being acquaintances of the writers. Much of the twaddle relative to family matters that finds its way into their columns might be prevented from appearing, if ladies and gentlemen would take steps to prevent their servants from becoming intimate with the reporters. A newspaper that gives daily the minute details of domestic iniquity does much to encourage that iniquity. Such a sheet is a most active promoter of the devilish schemes of the libertine. The procuress finds in it an efficient ally. It provides quack doctors with our sons as patients (or victims). It increases the patronage of the gambling halls which are so minutely described (and located) in its columns. Its colored and graphic descriptions of the career of forgers, thieves and murderers of our sons. It is a pestilence, surcund deadly in the bosom of our families, reaching the innermost sanctity of our homes; and we tell you, the public, that you know these things as well as we, and that you will read these words and go placidly on devouring the vile stuff just as usual. Because you, the said public, "are an ass." CLERICUS.

— At Woodward's Gardens there are on exhibition some Fijian cannibals—savage, black-looking fellows, who sing their native war-songs with a strong Jewish accent that curdles the blood of the auditor with mortal terror. It is positively alarming to observe the carelessness with which people expose their clean, fat young within easy reach of these reckless anthropophagi. The other day we noticed a gentleman who not only permitted his little man-child to play about their feet, but even encouraged him in this dangerous familiarity. He appeared to think himself unobserved, and if we could have imagined a motive, we should have thought he was just trying to see how much temptation the average cannibal will stand. He not only threw bon-bons among them and tempted the child to creep after the unaccustomed sweets, but once or twice, when with an instinctive sense of danger it started to retreat, he cautiously reached out his foot and pushing the innocent back, turned away and became all at once profoundly absorbed in the study of a crucified beetle on the wall. We don't know why these cannibals did not eat that baby, but they did not. They looked, however, as if they would like to sell the inhuman father a suit of cheap clothing, and we think the unnatural villain richly deserved that they should.

— A Roman monk has been condemned to twenty years of hard labor. Zaborare est orare, good brother; thou shalt pray some of the accretions of meditative piety off thy holy bones, and shalt emerge from thine orisons a leaner and a wiser man.

Prosperity.

I doubt if the maxims the Stoic adduces,
 Be true in the main when they state
 That our nature's improved by adversity's uses,
 And spoil by a happier fate.
 The heart that is tried by misfortune and pain,
 Self-reliance and patience may learn;
 Yet worn by long waiting and wishing in vain,
 It often grows callous and stern.
 But the heart that is softened by ease and contentment,
 Feels warmly and kindly t'wards all;
 And its charity, soured by no moody resentment,
 Embraces alike great and small.
 So, although in the season of rain storms and showers,
 The tree may strike deeper its roots,
 It needs the warm brightness of sunny hours
 To ripen the blossoms and fruit. — Chambers' Journal.

The New Loan of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury has by the following circular revoked the authority given to the agents heretofore appointed to receive subscriptions for Four per cent. and Four and One-Half per cent. Bonds in combination with the Five per cents:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., August 14th, 1871.

I have deemed it advisable, upon further consideration, to withdraw the loan for the present from the market, with the exception of the five per cent. bonds as offered to the national banks by the circular letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 10th inst. This communication relates to the four per cent. and the four and a half per cent. bonds in combination with the five per cent. bonds.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, Secretary of the Treasury.

To the Agents designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate the new loan.

We now annex the names composing the American Syndicate, coöperating with Messrs. Jay Cooke & Co., and also a number of those in the European Syndicate (received by Cable), to which will be added, by mail, several important firms, whose subscriptions are telegraphed in the aggregate. The American Syndicate is composed of: Jay Cooke & Co., New York, Philadelphia and Washington; Fisk & Hatch, Vermilye & Co., J. W. Seligman & Co., Henry Clews & Co., Leonard, Sheldon & Foster, First National Bank and Fourth National Bank, New York; First National Bank, Philadelphia; First National Bank, Washington. And this Syndicate subscribes now for Ten Millions in new five per cent. bonds.

The European names, so far, are the following: Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., R. Raphael & Sons, Bischoffsheim & Goldschmit, Louis Cohen & Sons, Clews, Habicht & Co., Speyer Brothers, Seligman Brothers, the Anglo Hungarian Bank, P. Cazenove & Co., Samuel Montague & Sons, Foster & Braithwaite and Satterthwaite & Co., London; Seligman & Stutheimer, L. Speyer Ellison, and Emil Erlanger & Co., Frankfort-on-the-Main; Lippman, Rosenthal & Co., and Wertheim & Gompertz, Amsterdam; Behrens & Sons, Hamburg; John Monroe & Co., and Andrews & Co., Paris; Oppenheim, Errera & Co., Brussels; and S. Bleichroeder, Berlin.

The subscription of this European Syndicate is for Fifteen millions. With the subscriptions of these Syndicates, and the Twenty Millions taken from his surplus Gold, the Secretary will be able to announce his readiness to redeem Forty-five Millions of Five-Twenties of 1862, at par and interest; the interest ceasing according to law ninety days after designation for payment.

— Your journalist, particularly your peripatetic, gossipy correspondent, is exceedingly fond of describing the differences between the ladies of different cities. He points out with exact minuteness wherein the female of Baltimore varies from the female of Boston, and the particulars in which she of New York is unlike her of San Francisco or Chicago. There is no evil in this kind of acuteness; while one is noting the discrepancies between women he is not stealing, nor plundering on the high seas, nor murdering his aged mother, nor running for office. He ought, therefore, to be encouraged in unfolding and developing his harmless philosophy; albeit, it is like the game of chess or "Pussy-wants-a-corner"—a merely intellectual recreation. The truth is, women of the same station, from Maine to Texas, and from Florida to Washington Territory, are as like as young rats. They are all of a kind; and although in divers particulars objectionable, are, upon the whole, endurable. Anyhow they are unavoidable.

— We are told that there is nothing made in vain. But how about a pretty young girl? Isn't she maiden vain?

Storm Freaks Abroad.

A correspondent of the London Graphic says: "Some of the pranks played by dame nature during the recent thunder storms deserves to be placed on record. In one of the Scottish sea coast towns a shower of fish fell. The theory is that they had been taken up in a water spout and driven ashore by the wind. At a village in Leicestershire a cow was shot dead by thunderstone. The projectile was found beneath the animal's hide after death. On an island in Loch Lomond, a forrester was striding among a flock of sheep, which had taken shelter beneath some trees, when he heard a terrific crash, and at the same instant was almost blinded by a flood of intensely bright light. On recovering himself, he found that two of the trees between which he was passing were shattered to splinters, and twelve of the sheep lay dead. Personally he was unharmed. In a Nottinghamshire hamlet, an old agricultural laborer and his wife were sitting in the chimney corner, when a "streak" of lightning poured down the chimney, taking off the old man's right whisker as cleanly and as harmlessly as if he had been shaved there, but completely withering the old lady's left hand. In another case the lightning got into a clock store-room. Every clock in the room was stopped, and while many were shattered to pieces, the hands and some of the other metal work of two or three were literally melted by the subtle electric stream. The store-room itself, it should be stated, was riven obliquely from top to bottom on one side. A sewer running from Ashton and passing under the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire railway, between Guide Bridge and Dunkinfield, was so charged by the rainfall that it burst and caused a subsidence in the permanent way, which would no doubt have resulted in painfully fatal consequences but for the accidental discovery of the mischief by a laborer who was trespassing on the line by way of finding a short cut home from his work. He was the means of stopping a heavily-laden passenger train half a mile before it reached a chasm in the line, twelve feet deep and several feet in width.

Buying and Selling in Madrid.

The following is the way they buy and sell in Madrid, if a correspondent tells the truth: A nut-brown maid is attracted by a brilliant red and yellow scarf. She asks the sleepy merchant, nodding before his wares, "What is this rag worth?" He answers with profound indifference, "Ten reals."

"Hombre! Are you dreaming or crazy?" She drops the coveted neck-gear and moves on, apparently horror-stricken.

The shopman calls her back peremptorily. "Don't be rash. The scarf is worth twenty reals, but for the sake of Santissima Maria, I offered it to you for half price. Very well. You are not suited. What will you give?"

"Caramba! Am I buyer and seller as well? The thing is worth three reals; more is a robbery."

"Jesu! Maria! Jose! and all the family! Go thou with God! We cannot trade. Sooner than sell for less than eight reals I shall raise the cover of my brains! Go thou. It is eight of the morning, and still thou dreamest."

She lay down the scarf reluctantly, saying, "Five?" But the outraged mercer snorts scornfully, "Eight is my last word. Go to!"

She moves away, thinking how well that scarf would look in the Apollo Gardens, and casts over her shoulder a Parthian glance, and bids, "Six!"

"Take it! It is madness, but I cannot waste my time in bargaining."

Both congratulate themselves on the operation. He would have taken five, and she would have given seven. How trade would suffer if we had windows in our breasts.

A Hopeful Scheme.

A brace of big chiefs of the Snake Indians have been in town, and are making the grand tour of the State. California's matchless climate and marvellous soil are said to have received their highest encomiums, and they are confident that directly they make known the unrivaled attractions of this State, the Snakes will immigrate hither in swarms. A movement is on foot among some of our first citizens to organize an association to pay their expenses to San Francisco and sell Government lands to them when they shall arrive. This Society will incorporate to-day, and will be called the Snake Charmer. We wish it a long lease of active usefulness, and shall aspire to be its organ. Monsieur Berton, Vice Consul of the French Commune at Sacramento, has been picked out for President, and the Emperor Norton is favored for Secretary. A keno game will be set up to further the objects of the association: one object being to assist the wealthy Snakes with good advice as to the status of our various mining enterprises, so that they may intelligently invest their beads and tobacco. But, Lord! how we do run on—and how Mons. Berton is about to run off.

— A broker named Critcher having mysteriously disappeared, and being a defaulter to a considerable amount, it has been ingeniously suggested that it would be an act of humanity to drag the bay for his body. We think a more effective measure would be to put a pinch of salt upon his coat-tail.

Margate.

I hail once more
The margate shore
All sprinkled o'er
    With dippers,
Machines in rows,
And belles and beaux,
And those—ah, those
    Buff slippers!
The gorgeous "togs,"
The "jolly dogs,"
The synagogues's
    Attendants,
With matrons there
With jewels rare,
Who brooches wear,
    And pendants!
The baths, the shops,
The girls, the fops,

The lollipops,
    The winks.
The gulls that glide
Above the tide,
As there outside
    It twinkles!
My sweet retreat
With joy complete
Again I greet,
    O, Margate!
And London cares,
And life's affairs,
And scrip and shares,
And bulls and bears,
My muse forswears,
And even dares—
Though Rhyme despairs—Objargate!

The "News Letter" Abroad.

As one evidence of the wide-spread circulation of our paper in all quarters of the world, we may mention that we are in constant receipt of orders from the principal cities of South America, more particularly Valparaiso, Callao, and Lima. Gentlemen who have visited these cities and returned, and through whom, for the most part, the orders are conveyed, inform us that the News Letter is the only journal mentioned where reference is made to the newspaper press of San Francisco. Americans find in it a freshness entirely foreign to the heavy dailies; and Englishmen do not hesitate to admit—although ignorant of our local matters—that the treatment of various topics is, in witty pungency, superior to the style of their best periodicals. Even English-speaking German and French residents hail the News Letter as a favorite. Of course this paragraph will be thought a little too florid in our own behalf; but our readers will please bear in mind that what we say is but the substance of conversations had with visitors who have called at this office, and who are disinterested enough to simply state facts of which they are cognizant. Under these circumstances we may be excused for feeling a little self-complacency.

[Let us add to these gratifying encomiums that they are from one who has just returned from South America, and who, from his gifted intelligence, is entitled to implicit belief. His long residence here, and his relations with our influential press, must satisfy every one the News Letter is not self-eulogistic.]

The Washington Treaty.

The Washington treaty is referred to in the Queen's speech, delivered at the prorogation of the British Parliament on Monday last, as follows: "With special satisfaction I refer on the present occasion to our relations with the United States. By the treaty of Washington modes of settlement have been fixed for several questions which have long remained in dispute, my communications with the American Government not being without promise of advantage to other countries. The President has concurred with me in the application of that principle of amicable reference which is proclaimed by the treaty of Paris, which I rejoice to have the opportunity of recommending by example; and we have also agreed in the adoption of certain rules for guiding the maritime conduct of neutrals which may, I trust, ere long, obtain general recognition and form a valuable addition to the code of international law. I place full reliance upon the disposition of the Americans to carry forward with cordiality and zeal the subsidiary arrangements which have been determined on for the execution of the treaty. I shall apprise the Parliament of Canada that the provisions which require its consent are, in my view, highly conducive to the interests of the Dominion—on these provisions, however, that Parliament will pass independent and final judgment."

— A female, who, as nearly as we can at this moment recollect, is named Laura D. Fair Gordon, is running for the Legislature somewhere in the San Joaquin country, and a contemporary shallowly remarks that we shall soon have a woman seeking election to the Presidency. Victoria C. Woodhull already strives for that distinction, but as the Constitution expressly stipulates that the President shall be thirty-five years of age, it is extremely improbable that any lady in whom the womanly instinct is strong will ever confess to being qualified.

— The Queen, the Prince, and the Princess Royal of Denmark, with the King of Greece, have gone on a visit to the Princess of Wales.

Court Chat.

— One of the most touching incidents of the late war has yet to be recorded. When the Prince de Salm-Salm returned to Europe after the death of the Emperor Maximilian at Queretaro, the Archduchess Sophia appointed the Princess to an official post at Schonbrunn. The Princess soon became the bosom friend and companion of the Archduchess, who still refuses to be comforted for the loss of her favorite son. The Prince meanwhile had joined the army and fell at Gravelotte. The Princess, although entirely deprived of all fortune by the deplorable event of Mexico, and wholly dependent on the bounty of the Archduchess, hesitated not to sacrifice the sum of 5,000 francs—all she possessed—to recover her husband's remains. The watch, the signal of recognition of the body, besides the usual tokens of uniform and accoutrements, was of peculiar make—a present from the Emperor Maximilian, and of pure Mexican gold, to which was attached a chain of the same material, with a locket containing a small photographic portrait of the Princess, with the initials of husband and wife, and the motto, four times repeated, "For ever mine," in German, English, French, and Spanish. For a considerable time no hope was entertained for the recovery of the body, when at last the five thousand francs reward was claimed by a certain peasant of Gravelotte, who had discovered the body of an officer in uniform, too much decomposed, however, to be recognizable, but in whose pocket the watch was found with a portion of the chain still attached. The printed description distributed all over the country had made it familiar enough to the inhabitants. The reward was cheerfully paid, although the chain was broken and the locket with the Princess' likeness was gone. The body was brought to Vienna and there interred with all due reverence, and the Princess de Salm-Salm went to pray each day beside the tomb. Last week intelligence arrived from the Mayor of Gravelotte declaring that the real body of the Prince de Salm had been found in a little wood on the hill beside the battle field, and as proof of the identity, in spite of the utter impossibility of recognition, the pocket-book, marked with the Prince's cypher, containing several letters addressed to him by the Princess, were discovered beside him, and the remnants of a gold chain, to which was attached the locket containing the portrait of the Princess, were found still clutched in the grasp of the skeleton fingers of the corpse! The announcement has produced the greatest sensation in Vienna, and the supposition is that the watch must have been found in the possession of a robber, and that the Prince had succeeded in tearing the portrait from his grasp.

— The Court Circular relates the following anecdote respecting a noble lady, who "is young, beautiful and good:" During the Army Bill debate her noble husband, who is as proud and fond of her as he should be, was just about to rise and deliver a violent attack upon something or somebody, when a telegram was put into his hands. He read it, turned pale, and quitted the House: called a cab, drove to the Charing Cross Station, and went to Dover, and was no more heard of until the next day, when he returned to his own home, and to his first inquiry was told the countess was in her own room. He hastened to her, and a terrific row ensued, the exact words of which no one knows but themselves. At last, however, he burst out, "Then, what did you mean by your telegram?" "Mean! what I said, of course. What are you talking about?" "Read it for yourself," returned the still unappeased husband. She did read: "I flee with Mr. — to Dover straight. Pray for me." For a moment she was startled, but then burst into a hearty fit of laughter. "Those dreadful telegraph people! No wonder you are out of your mind. I telegraphed simply, 'I flee with Mrs. — in Dover street. Stay for me.' His lordship was so savage at the laugh he had raised against himself, that he was at first inclined to make a parliamentary question of it, but listening to more judicious advice refrained.

— It is now confidently asserted that the Marquis of Lorn and the Princess Louisa will not only make a visit to the New Dominion, but take up their residence there for a lengthened period. At Ottawa the residence of the Governor General is being prepared for their reception. We have no doubt that the young people will find themselves very happy among the Canadian people. There is but small chance of their being treated as they and their brothers were treated in Dublin. Unless we greatly mistake, it may be found that there is as much loyalty throughout the Dominion as there is throughout the British Isles—as much in Ottawa as in London. In the Dominion, where Scotsmen abound and where Campbells are numerous, the Marquis is sure to be popular; and most assuredly his young wife, for her own sake, and for the sake of her mother, will not be neglected. It was hinted some time ago that Prince Arthur might be appointed Governor General of Canada. Is it not just as likely that the Marquis of Lorn may be appointed to that high office? We wish the young people a pleasant time.

— The marriage of the Princess Mary of Holland and the Prince of Wied has already been announced by telegraph. A letter in the Paris Constitutionnel gives some family details of the happy couple. The Princess is thirty years old, and the Prince twenty-five. The bride is heiress to one of the largest fortunes in Europe, and, like Mlle. de Montpensier formerly, had been asked for in marriage by all the lackland Princes of both hemispheres. The Princess, we are told, is an excellent musician and a capital cook; she not only played the organ during a part of the marriage ceremony, but made her own wedding cake.

— The Marquis of Lorn has promised to preside at the 207th anniversary festival of the Scottish Corporation, which will take place at the Freemason's Tavern on St. Andrew's Day.

China Trade Returns.

The "Returns of Trade at the Treaty Ports of China for 1870" appear most opportunely at the time when the Treaty rights of foreigners are menaced, though only indirectly, by the recent circular of the Chinese Government. It may be reasonably hoped that the American and English public will be awakened to a sense of the great value of trade with China. The first table shows that the imports into what we may fairly term "Free China" have risen from fifty-one million taels in 1864 to sixty-nine million taels in 1870. In the same six years the exports advanced from fifty-four million to sixty-one million taels. The Customs revenue has risen from eight and a half millions in 1866 to nine and a half in 1870. The table of the annual value of the trade with each country speaks even more eloquently of the growing importance of commerce in the Far East. English imports are shown to have more than doubled themselves in value in six years; while exports have fallen off nearly 20 per cent. in the same time. The Chinese are therefore twice as good customers to foreigners as they were six years ago, and we are considerably less good customers than we were to them at that time. Can anything speak more forcibly in favor of our maintaining Treaty rights inviolate than such figures as these, which prove that the advantages of communication and trade is more appreciated by the Chinese than by ourselves? All the animosity and special pleading of the Mandarins cannot get over the hard dry facts of the statistics before us. We hope the lesson they read will not be lost on the Government, and that they will not fail to see that any concession of our Treaty rights would not only inevitably plunge us into war, and exercise a prejudicial influence on trade, but that it would be absolutely totally opposed to the wishes of the Chinese people themselves, who are most anxious and ready to encourage the import of our manufactures.—China Express.

About Dogs.

Of a Newfoundland dog, purchased by his father, and of a smaller one bred in the house, the Rev. S. Drew used to relate the following story: The dairy was under a room which was used occasionally as a barn and for apples, into which the fowls sometimes found their way; and in scratching among the chaff, scattered the dust into the pans of milk below, to the great annoyance of the rev. gentleman's mother-in-law. In this a favorite cock of hers was the chief transgressor. One day in harvest she went into the dairy, followed by the little dog, and finding dust again thrown into the milk-pans, exclaimed, "I wish that cock was dead!" Not long after, she being with others of the family in the harvest field, they observed the little dog dragging along the cock just killed, which, with an air of triumph, he laid at the feet of Mrs. Drew. Highly exasperated at the literal fulfillment of her hastily-uttered wish, she snatched a stick from the hedge and attempted to give the dog a beating. The luckless animal, seeing the reception he was likely to meet with, when he expected to receive marks of approbation, left the bird and ran off, she brandishing her stick and saying in a loud and angry tone, "I'll pay thee for this by and by." In the evening, when about to put this threat into execution, she found the little dog established in one corner of the room, and the large one standing before it. She endeavored to make the large dog get out of her way, but he plainly gave her to understand that he was not at all disposed to relinquish his post. She then tried to get at the little dog behind him, but the threatening gesture and fiercer growl of the large one sufficiently indicated that the attempt would be not a little perilous. The result was that she was obliged to abandon her design.

Change of London Agents for the United States.

WASHINGTON, August 31st.—It is officially announced that Clews, Habricht & Co., London, have been appointed official agents for the United States Government for all foreign countries, which agency has heretofore been held by Baring Bros. for thirty years past, having been given them after the negotiation of the Ashburton treaty, out of compliment to Lord Ashburton, who was then a member of the firm. The change is now made to recognize the services of the house of Henry Clews & Co. in behalf of the Government in its financial measures in the past, and to reward its own citizens by preference over foreign competitors when its own interests will be equally well served. The details were arranged to-day, a deposit having been made yesterday.

— Wonder if Demosthenes used to imprecate any in Greek, and if in the gloom of Hades his shade retains that unhappy habit. If so, he must wax eloquently profane as he is favored by some newly arrived San Franciscan with a copy of the Demosthenic Monthly. It very nearly makes us blasphemers!

— In the Fifteenth District Court is pending a case entitled Catharine Hoggs vs. Albert F. Hoggs. Such swinishness is grievous for to see. Why can't these piggs dwell peacefully together like other Christians? It makes us ashamed of our species.

One Swallow Maketh not a Summer.

Did she give a tender glance	Did she call thee fond or dear,
When thy tongue refused to speak?	Sitting dreamily alone?
Let it not thy bliss enhance,	Drive the echo from thine ear,
Nor for future glances seek;	Be not tricked by one sweet tone;
One such look from maiden's eye	One such whisper does not prove
Is no pledge of constancy.	That she yields thee all her love.

Did she heave a deep-drawn sigh
When thou had'st a sad farewell?
Did a tear-drop dim her eye?
Yield not to the potent spell;
One such tear or ling'ring sigh
Prove not she will love for aye.

HOURS OF EXERCISE IN THE ALPS. By Professor John Tyndall. Published by Appleton & Co., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

One of the most charming books of the season is Professor Tyndall's last work, "Hours of Exercise in the Alps." It is a collection of a series of articles, most of which have already appeared in print in England, on mountaineering, and some chapters on scientific subjects. The narratives are told in a straightforward, easy, agreeable way, with every now and then a scrap of romance, a passing thought on religion, a bit of verse, or a dash of metaphysics, and are full of a certain manliness which must always be the chief charm of a book of adventures. The work embraces all of Professor Tyndall's explorations and observations in the Alps from 1857 to 1869, with graphic accounts of the assault of the Matterhorn, and the expeditions in which the celebrated guide Bensen lost his life, and it is scarcely too much to say that "Hours of Exercise in the Alps" is the best and will be the most popular account yet given of explorations in that region.

THE LAST OF THE ALDINI. By George Sand. Published by Peterson & Co., Philadelphia; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

This work has none of the peculiar charm of "Consuelo," the dramatic interest of "The Snow Man," nor yet the pathos of "La Petite Fadette." In fact it is very far inferior to most of Madame Sand's writings; and without one has a long life before them, and much time to waste, we should scarcely advise a perusal of "The Last of the Aldini."

OLD AND NEW. For August. Published monthly by Robert Bros., Boston.

Although published at the "Hub," this new magazine seems more liberal in its inclinations than the generality of Boston publications, as we notice among the contributors to the present number Edward Pollard, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Freeman Clarke, Edward Hale, and the tone of the articles is a decided relief from the everlasting Yankee glorification of the Atlantic Monthly.

MORE HAPPY THOUGHTS. By F. C. Berman. Published by Robert Bros., Boston; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

We think it a pity that Mr. Burnan should have published "More Happy Thoughts." We were so well satisfied and delighted with "Happy Thoughts," that we now rise from the feast—a very good feast, too—feeling that we have had too much, and that this last work is something of a burden, like the Scriptural grasshopper. However, to searchers after small talk, and for a hasty glance in railway or steamboat, we think it will prove acceptable.

— Dr. Darwin, the great magnetic healer, whose method of treatment consists simply in "bringing into action the potent elements of nature and the recuperative forces of the system," confesses that he cannot cure all diseases. Then we don't want him round. The potent elements and recuperative forces are no better than quinine and ipecacuanha if they won't do their work any better. It pains us to say it, but Dr. Darwin is unquestionably a humbug who has yet to learn the rudiments of his art.

— A murderer, who was to have been throttled last Thursday at San Leandro, has been reprieved by the Governor till the 22d inst.—after election. The delay was granted to give opportunity for looking into the case; that is, the crime was committed to obtain possession of a gun, and the Chief Magistrate would like to ascertain if it were a rifle or a shotgun. This doubt having been solved by the State election, Mr. Amador will be hoisted skyward without any further nonsense.

— Lady Guinness, wife of Sir A. Guinness, has been the belle of the Lord Mayor's ball in Dublin. Her ladyship wore diamonds to the value of £20,000.

Curious Tax Case.

A curious case has arisen in the county of Donegal, Ireland. Off the shores of that county is a small island called Tory Island, the surface of which is estimated in the acreage of the county, and consequently returned to pay a certain proportion of county cess; but the men of Tory Island will not pay county cess: They frightened a collector nearly out of his senses the other day, who ventured out to them in a boat with summonses and receipts. The poor man gave a dreadful account of them to the grand jury of Donegal. "They buy nothing from the mainland, they have no minister of religion, they are semi-barbarians and savages, and they will not pay county cess," which last seems to be the climax of their iniquity. "It would take 1,000 military and police to collect the cess there," said one of the grand jury. The end is that the aid of the Government is to be sought to compel these wild fishermen to submit to fiscal civilization and pay up their cess. As these primitive islanders have no country roads or country bridges, no court-houses, police, nor military, it seems rather hard to make them pay county cess, especially when the cost of collecting it will far exceed the return, to say nothing of the danger to any bailiff who ventures amongst them. They govern themselves in their own way, and nothing is heard of thefts or assassinations amongst them. They receive no benefit from their nominal connection with the county of Donegal, and they do not wish their poor island to be taxed for public works they never see.

Where and How to Die.

For my own part, one ditch I know from which, methinks, the soul might pass more sweetly into the arms of the waiting angel than from any other spot of earth. On a hillside that slopes to the western sea; beneath an old stone-dyke, stone first, but now hardly to be known for such at any time, the mosses, green, and yellow, and purple, and the scented bracken, and the blaeberrys with their tender sprigs, have so covered it, and in the summer time, when it is gay with tall foxglove and tufted meadow-sweet, and the low plants blush with fairy plums, more like a hedge of flowers—under the shadow of this lies my ditch, growing full of heather, and lying there you may look far away to the islands in the horizon, and hear nothing, at noisiest midday or at quietest sun-set, but the sea, and the cry of the mountain birds, and the faint sigh of the wind in the flowers above. Lying there at twilight, I have seen in the western clouds such things as nowhere else may be seen—the vales of Avalon, the towers of the New Jerusalem—and I think it would be an easy death, stretched out on the ling, with the same sea-breezes that rocked me in my cradle to rock me to my grave, and that sea-whispered song to be my last, as it was my first, lullaby.—"On the Advantages of Dying in a Ditch," in the Dark Blue.

— It is pleasant to observe that our old friend, the "pestilence fly," has not forgotten us this season. He has appeared in some quantity at New York, and is spreading. To those who do not chance to be familiar with popular entomology it may be necessary to explain that the "pestilence fly" is a forefrier of epidemics—a pilot-fish to the shark cholera—a flying John the Baptist, crying in the wilderness "prepare ye the way of the plague." He is now upon his regular annual visit.

— The bonework of the whale recently stranded on the beach is being wired together for exhibition. The owners secured the services of the Academy of Sciences to get the bones into their proper places, but at the end of the first day the members were paid off and discharged. It has since transpired that they got the creature's head on the wrong end, and had rejected several sections of the backbone, claiming that the animal had more vertebrae than the books allowed him.

— Mon. J. Berton has resigned the Presidency of the Emigrant Aid Society at Sacramento, and intends visiting France to see if he is really Vice-Consul, and to ascertain to which of the late French Governments his allegiance is due. It is to be hoped that he will not delay his decamping until after another meeting of his "Mining Bureau." We believe he was sick when last it met. He will be a great deal sicker before it meets again.

— Cady Stanton says she never knew what it was to be perfectly happy until she found herself in Yosemite, astride of a mule. The mule's feelings have not been ascertained; if he had no saddle on, it is to be presumed he drew some consolation from the reflection that at least he had not the angular Susan embracing his back.

— Aesop's fable of the ass in the lion's skin holds good to-day.—Barnacle. [We were about to remark that you were an illustration of it, but the jest would be but a shallow one, very much after your own fashion of wit. Besides, it is not true; the voice is indeed the voice of an ass, but the skin is the skin of a calf.]

Marguerite.

BY NELLY MACKAY HUTCHINSON.

From dawn to nightfall, at her window sitting,
 She waits, while drift the heavy hours away;
 And, like the swallows, all her thoughts go flitting
 To that sweet South wherein they fain would stay.

Up from the street there comes the lazy laughter
 Of girls who linger by the fountain's fall;
 She heeds them not—her gaze still follows after
 The clouds that roll beyond the city wall.

She vaguely hears her mother's fretful chiding,
 Her idle wheel grows dusty at her side;
 Listless she wonders where her Love is hiding,
 Where'er he be there must her heart abide.

All the day long she listens for his coming,
 All the day long she dreams of one dear face;
 She hears his dear whisper in the bees' low humming,
 She feels his kisses in the wind's embrace.

Lonely she dreams while the warm sunshine lingers
 Upon the carven angels of her chair—
 Alone sits sobbing, while with silver fingers
 The moonbeams thread her soft, unbraided hair.

Ah, heavy heart! so passionate its yearning,
 She needs must know that all her peace is o'er;
 That eager pain 'neath her white bosom burning
 Tells her 'tis gone, to enter there no more.

* * * *

Still at her window, dreaming, longing, weeping,
 While to their mates the gray doves coo and call,
 She leans and watches the slow clouds go creeping
 Far down the blue, beyond the city wall.

— We have been requested by an invalid pig, who is too fat to attend the play, to give a brief synopsis of the drama of Ready, at the California Theater. With pleasure: Jo. Semite, a notorious fraud, has an adopted daughter, Miss Calphurnia Street; also a painfully ridiculous ward—the Eighth Ward. If we mistake not—and the two are a part of the time in love, and a part of the time in the mountains. Jo. Semite had formerly an adopted son, named Harry Meiggs, who was last heard of building a wharf for the President of Patagonia, and executing some characteristic forgeries. This character is represented by Mr. Vivian in a song entitled "Ten Thousand Miles Away," by permission of Mr. Maguire. In the course of time he (not Tom Maguire, but Harry Meiggs,) returned to San Francisco, bringing along, quite naturally, Cape Horn—a brother of B. C. Horn, the tobacconist. Together they propose to Calphurnia, and are accepted. As they are both Democrats, the Eighth Ward, who is staunch Republican, is very indignant, and goes after them with a Big Tree. They leap over the Golden Gate and escape, but are afterward killed by a fellow named Selim Rock, who falls foul of them and breaks their bones by pitching stones from the Farallones. (There is some poetry in the play, but not a word of truth.) Miss Calphurnia lets her Bridal Veil Fall, which is gallantly picked up and pocketed by John McCullough. She indignantly leaves the stage, and it is worth a Chinese Quarter to see how she manages her Mariposa Trail. At this point the play stops, but the scenery continues wildly rushing on as long as the audience will stand it. We omitted to mention that the carpenter and blacksmith are entitled to great credit for the admirable manner in which the play is constructed.

— A party of three hundred armed men have left Camp Grant to explore the unknown portion of Arizona. Many attempts have been made to penetrate this mysterious region, all of which have been eminently successful, but none of the penetrators have returned. If they have increased and multiplied at the usual census rate, there must be a populous colony of them somewhere in there; and there is some prospect that the present expedition will be able to join them. We trust that Mr. Satan has been apprised of the movement. We all know how vexatious it is to have a lot of people to dinner without anything nice prepared.

— The village of Athens, Maine, has three religious denominations, and they all worship in the same building. Exchange. [At Woodward's Gardens, in this city, a pig, an owl, and an ape worship in the same cage. They hold a love feast every day at 3 P.M., to the unspeakable edification of everybody.]

Military.

The Bulletin is dissatisfied with the present regulations of the army regarding promotions. So far as we can unravel its position, it is something like this: Promotions below the rank of general officers should be made by merit—that is, if a Second Lieutenant is a better officer than a Lieutenant Colonel the Second Lieutenant should be given the first vacant Colonelcy. Seniority nor rank should count. To this otherwise excellent plan there are several objections. First, there is the difficulty of determining by some fixed and accurate standard who are the better officers. Second, there is the impossibility of always getting this standard honestly applied. Third, there is the weakness of human nature, by virtue of which men do not serve with extreme zeal under their former subordinates, and the fact that this zeal is not increased by a knowledge that there were reasons unflattering to themselves for so reversing the situation. Could these trifling objections be overcome, the change demanded by our unmilitary, but not always civil, contemporary might advantageously be made, if there existed any necessity for them. But the fact is that the thing as now arranged is the result of some ages of experience, is the best that could possibly be devised, and meets the approval of the very class of officers that our neighbor's method is intended to benefit. Above the grade of Colonel, promotion is made as nearly "by merit" as is possible in the present somewhat objectionable condition of human nature. That is, the Bulletin's plan is put in operation; and in this case it is eminently proper. General officers are appointed from the rank of Colonel by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. But even here the Bulletin seems to be hopelessly dissatisfied, without clearly making known its desire. The sum and substance of the matter is that our neighbor knows nearly as much about an army as he did about strategy at the beginning of the late European unpleasantness, when he had "quadrilaterals" very bad, and proposed to transfer one of these things from German to French territory, so that it might be stormed and taken by the French invaders. It is to be deplored that the average editor should ever acquire the belief that there is a public necessity for him to discuss the military system without having first comprehended it; but if he ever does contract that cheerful delusion he may act upon it with least harm to his reputation for sense, by carrying on the discussion orally, and making some deaf gentleman the recipient of his peculiar opinion.

— It is surprising that Mr. Seward has found the Sultan "an intelligent and agreeable gentleman." It was to have been expected that being a Sultan, and therefore a trembling despot, he would have turned out to be a person of savage aspect and coarse conversation. It seems almost incredible that a Mahometan, addicted to polygamy, opium, turbans and sitting with his legs folded under him, should be intelligent and agreeable! We fear the gilded pagentry of effete despotisms—the hollow pomp of Old World monarchy—the tinsel shows of crumbling dynasties—have turned the simple Republican head of Mr. Seward, and unfitted him to represent a free people. Should he ever become a candidate for the Presidency this cringing and fawning at the footstool of tyranny will tell fearfully against him!

— Two prisoners having escaped from the jail at Austin, Nevada, the Sheriff delegated a party of Indians to effect their capture. Naturally, one of the prisoners was killed. Are there no bloodhounds to be obtained at Austin? Perhaps the Sheriff might find it advantageous to dispatch a posse of rattlesnakes after the remaining prisoner.

A Woman's Execution.--Paris, May, 1871.

Sweet-breathed and young,
The people's daughter;
No nerves unstrung—
Going to slaughter!
"Good morning, friends!
You'll love us better.
Make us amends:
We've burst your fetter!
How the sun gleams!
Women are snarling;
Give me your beams,
Liberty's darling!
Marie's my name—
Christ's mother bore it;
That badge? No shame;
Glad that I wore it!"

(Hair to her waist,
Limbs like Venus;
Robes are displaced);
"Soldiers, please screen us!
He at the front?
That is my lover:
Stood all the brunt!
Now the fight's over!
Powder and bread
Gave out together;
Droll to be dead
In this bright weather!
Jean, boy! we might
Have married in June!
This the wall? Right!
Vive la Commune!"

—Edward King.

In the Name of Religion--Impudence!

We have been favored with the Prospectus of the "Evangelical Schools Society for Italy." There are sixteen lady presidents; eight male members: an hon. treasurer; and a foreign secretary, Miss Bruce Sutherland. We have not the felicity of a personal acquaintance with the foreign secretary. We do not know whether she is young and beautiful, or very much adult and cosmetized. We guess she is a native of Scotland, because Sutherland is rather Scottish, and so is Bruce. Probably Miss Bruce Sutherland is one of the animated curiosities of the British Museum. Female philanthropists are fond of breathing the learned atmosphere of the Reading Room. Once or twice, when stress of ignorance has compelled us to recur to the national bookshelves, we have been "struck all of a heap" by the petticoated learning. It is so very unabashed. So is the prospectus of the Evangelical Schools Society for Italy. In slip-slop English the sixteen lady presidents announce that they are about to set up middle-class schools in Italy, that the headquarters are to be in Rome, and that Miss Bruce Sutherland and other ladies are about to proceed to Rome. We call this impudence. The middle classes in Italy can educate their children without the aid of Miss Bruce Sutherland and Co. (Limited). The sixteen ladies assert they are engaged in God's work, and that "His finger so evidently points the way," and much more of that sort of stuff. We call this blasphemy. If Miss Bruce Sutherland and Co. will pay a visit to St. Giles', they will find that there is plenty of educational work to be done at home. To be sure, that sort of work is neither profitable nor notorious.—London Figaro.

—The Melbourne Leader has an account of a machine just introduced for the benefit of Australian sportsmen which we venture to bring under the notice of the Gun Club. It is a sort of catapult, and is recommended as "superseding to some extent the expense incurred in pigeon-shooting." A glass globe, about eight inches in circumference, is placed in a cup attached to the machine, and the catapult being worked the globe is jerked high into the air, the sportsman being required to bring it down flying—a feat which, we are assured, "requires considerable skill." With the exercise of a little of that faculty which the Marchioness called "make-believe," might not all pleasures that Hurlingham affords be secured by means of the catapult, with the additional advantage of their being unalloyed by reproaches of fastidious persons, who hint that perhaps the pigeons do not fully enter into the spirit of the sport? The ordinary glass globe might be improved upon by the insertion of a crimson fluid which at a distance might very well pass for blood, and if a few feathers were thrown in the illusion would be complete.

—A distant relative of ours—a religious weekly—says: "To go forth into the morning and feel the healing air upon the brow; to breathe in the dewy gentleness; to watch the sun springing grandly from his bed in the bottomless sea, and pour his power upon the western hills like the power of grace upon the sinful soul: these are the arguments before which the sophistries of the infidel and the logic of blaspheming fools are leveled with the dust!" It is rather evident that to make use of all these powerful arguments one must suffer some inconvenience. In the first place, he must get up in the morning—a violation of Nature's laws, which will make him a rheumatic angel in less than a year. Secondly, he must travel to the Atlantic seaboard; for on this side of the continent the sun does not rise from any sea, bottomless or otherwise. As these are very grave objections we would respectfully suggest that it might be as well for the laity to rely upon common sense to level the infidel, and leave the sunrise business to the more affluent clergy, who can afford to make the Eastern pilgrimage—upon free passes.

Post Dated Communication from Columbia--Aug., 1890.

I have often promised you I would give you the history of the United States, and inform you how the Irish came to rule over us. It is your misfortune, my dear children, that you are born of American parents, and now belong to a prescribed and oppressed race. Our forefathers came from England, and for nearly three hundred years their descendants lived upon American soil. During the latter part of the last century great revolutions occurred in Europe. The Germans, a great Protestant power now, as you know, embracing all the German-speaking nations, as well as what was formerly Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg and the larger part of Austria, went to war with France and conquered her. The King of Italy took advantage of the Pope, seized the Papal States, made Rome his capital and put his son upon the throne of Spain. Germany, under Bismarck, became thoroughly Protestant, and the German Church declared itself independent of the Church of Rome. About this time the great battle of Dorking was fought in England, and the Germans annexed the Kingdom of Great Britain, justifying the seizure because of the alleged necessity of embracing under one government all the German-speaking people, and as there was a Dutchman in London, they seized the Island of Great Britain and now use it for a workshop and coaling dépot for the German fleet. Ireland was at that time a part of Great Britain, and had been a source of fearful annoyance to the English Government, but when the Prussians, who were Protestants, had captured England, they made very short work of the Catholic Irish, and drove them off the Island, but, being a humane people, furnished ships to send them to America. The Americans were noticeably frightened and tried to resist, but two Irishmen by the name of Tweed and Sweeney, who had emigrated some years before, had stolen the city of New York, and owned all the wharves, and docks, and public places—had all the arsenals and armories occupied by Irish regiments. Protestant Irishmen had attempted to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, but the Catholic Irish kept on murdering them to such an extent every year that they all returned to Ireland and became Germans. The few Americans had dwindled to two-ninths of the population in 1871, and now there are only a few thousand living in the city of New York. As the old Catholic countries used to govern the Jews, so the Irish now compel all not of Celtic ancestry and Romish faith to live by themselves in what is called the "American quarter." The Pope, having been driven out of Rome, was invited to America. The city of Chicago was assigned to him for a capital, and Illinois was given as a Papal State for him to rule. In the mean time the Roman Catholic Irish distributed themselves over the whole country, changed the form of the government—electing Tweed to be "Head Center," and he now lives in the Capitol building at Washington and rules the country without the aid of any Congress. We used to have common schools when I was a boy—it was there that I learned to read and write. Now all schools are abolished, except certain institutions under control of Jesuits, where no branch of education is taught that does not harmonize with the teachings of the Catholic Church. In my days there used to be a great many newspapers, but they have all been suppressed, and now the only books printed are Catholic books and the only papers are Catholic journals. The national religion is papal, and at the elevation of the host it is made a felony for a Protestant not to bow and his property is confiscated for the offense. Some Protestants still have meetings in secret places.

The last act on the part of Americans was their determination to celebrate the Fourth of July. At this time all the Americans could vote, and the parade was accorded to them in order to secure their support at the polls, and because the Irish hated the English, and it was a favorite theme of American orators to abuse their English ancestors; but after the Alabama treaty, and after the subjugation of England by the Germans, Tweed, Head Center, abolished, by a decree, the Fourth of July, and in its place made St. Patrick's Day the national holiday. He alleged as a reason that every Fourth of July the Americans got drunk, created riots, and acted badly. At the same time, all the American regiments were dissolved, because it was found that they would not fire upon their countrymen. I cannot stop to tell you how, step by step, the Irish made their encroachments, first getting control of the Democratic party, then State Governments, filling all the offices, then securing the army and navy, then obtaining ascendancy in the general Government, till now the Americans seem to have changed places with the Irish, as I remember them in my time, for I am ashamed to say the Americans of to-day are an ignorant, dissolute set, always rioting, getting drunk, and are under the influence of a set of miserable, idle Protestant preachers, who instigate them to every mean act, and seem to be satisfied if they can get the money from American servant girls, and the highest ambition of an American now seems to be to get on the police or keep a corner grocery. No, I do not think anything can be done, because the Pope is infallible, and it is against the Constitution to believe that he can do any wrong, and as no one can vote without going first to a Catholic priest, making his confession, and getting a ballot with the sign of the cross upon it, I do not see exactly how we can manage it; besides, the priests make the people believe they will get a century or two of additional purgatory if they scratch the ticket; all stationery stores are closed on the day of election, and pencils are prohibited. Protestants are very heavily taxed to support Catholic schools, and there is a special Protestant tax to maintain what is called "Schools of the Presentation Convent," which all Protestant primary pupils are compelled to attend in order to learn their "Ave Maria," say their prayers in Latin, and count the beads upon rosaries blessed by the Pope. I advise you all, my children, to avoid so far as possible contact with American children, and when you become of suitable age I hope you will intermarry with the dominant race, so that in future generations you may lose sight of your forefathers and wipe out the stain of your ancestral blood. I have caused to be burned all our family pictures, and contemplate moving to another State, and writing an "O" or "Mc" before our name; and now, while you are young, you must practice drawing your upper lip toward your forehead, and you must get a hair brush for your teeth, thus in time our family will become good Irishmen, and again we may be honored in the land. Now, my children, you must all go to mass.

Antonio Gasparone.

Great excitement has been created in Rome by the arrival within its walls of Antonio Gasparone, the famous robber chief, with the remnants of his band, now again seeing the free light of day, after forty-six years' imprisonment: At the time that Pope Della Genga sat in St. Peter's chair, Gasparone and his bandits were the terror of the frontier district between Frosinone and Terracina, hovering on the hills that skirt the Pontine Marshes. As all the measures of the Papal Government against these formidable marauders had proved unavailing, a good priest, Monsignor Pellegrini, Vicar-General of Sezze, now still living, though eighty-seven years old, met the brigands in one of their mountain haunts, and tendered them, in the name of the Government, a free pardon and liberal pensions if they would surrender to the public force, and consent to quit the Papal States under solemn engagement never to return. The offer was accepted and the bargain struck. The band, twenty-two men strong, laid down their arms, and were escorted to Civita Vecchia, where, far from being allowed to set sail for some land of freedom, they were thrown into a jail, with an intimation that, instead of the gallows which they had richly deserved, their punishment would be life-long imprisonment. Upon the arrival of the Italian troops on their way to Rome a year ago, seven of the twenty-two still survived. Upon the news of Victor Emanuel's late visit to his new capital reaching their prison, Pietri Masi, the only man in the band who could read or write, represented to the king that Gasparone and his followers had never been tried or even indicted, and that, whatever might be their crimes—Gasparone himself is said to have at least fifty murders, besides arson, rapes, and burglaries on his conscience—the law had lost its hold upon them after more than thirty years' prescription, and they were now entitled to a full and free release. The justice of their demand was admitted, the seven prisoners are now at large, and, if not pensioned, are at least provided with means of sustenance at a charitable asylum for decrepit old men. On their arrival in Rome, these old cut-throats drove through the streets, relics as it were of that old Italy from which, it is to be hoped, a whole age of progress separates the present generation. Gasparone is now seventy-seven years of age, and his youngest companion is only ten years his senior. The old miscreants made their appearance in the Corso, in the Piazza Farnese, and the Campo dei Fiori, in their gala costume—conical hats with flying ribands and peacock feathers, velvet jackets and shorts, crimson silk sashes, and high gaiters; their snowy locks and beards, which reached down to their shoulders and breasts, enhancing the glance of their dark eyes, their wild but fine features, and their firm and erect bearing, indicative of a manly strength which nearly half a century's captivity had not wholly subdued. A curiosity, not unminged with a certain admiration, wrung cheers from the crowd which pressed everywhere on their path, the object of the general interest being, of course, the chief, Gasparone himself, who, besides deeds of daring worthy of a second Fra Diavolo, boasts of very close relationship with Cardinal Antonelli, the son of his mother's sister, twelve years younger than himself.

— We claim to have as little reverence as anybody, but there are certain outward observances of respect due to deities of all grades and conditions, including spiritual essences, wooden images and mud-gods. It is for this reason that we regard Mr. Ah Chew with extreme disfavor. Last Sunday this tobacco-tinted infidel went into the opium shop of his co-religionist, Mr. Ah Wah, and settled himself down for a quiet smoke. We grieve to add, that not content with this innocent enjoyment, Mr. Chew repeatedly and sacrilegiously freed his pipe of its ashes by knocking out the same upon the head of a brazen God belonging to his host. Mr. Wah protested in vain against this desecration of the Godhead; the atheistical smoker persisted in the awful iniquity until bumped on the pate with an iron bar. Thus doth offended Deity avenge his insulted divinity; let scoffers beware! Thus shall impiety be ever overtaken by a righteous retribution; let bad little boys lay the warning well to heart! It is true the stricken sinner afterward got up and wrought upon the vitals of his judge with a knife so that the latter died, and to the merely human understanding it would appear that piety got the worst of it; but a game is never out until it is played to a legitimate close, and while the good Ah Wah shall enjoy an eternity of rapture beating upon a golden gong, the sinful Ah Chew shall burn his opium in endless torment! So be it unto all who would make of the Godhead an ash-holder!

— Virginia City is writhing in the pangs of cholera morbus. The people up there have made a business of torturing the bowels of the earth, and it is meet that they should know how it is themselves.

An Idyl of the Period.

"Come right in—how are you, Fred?
Find a chair and have a light."
"Well, old boy, recovered yet
From the Mathers' jam last night?"
"Didn't dance; the German's old."
"Didn't you? I had to lead—
Awful bore—but where were you?"
"Sat it out with Mollie Meade:
Jolly little girl she is—
Said she didn't care to dance,
'D rather have a quiet chat;
Then she gave me such a glance!
Gave me her bouquet to hold,
Asked me to draw off her glove.
Then, of course, I squeezed her hand,
Talked about my wasted life,
Said my sole salvation must
Be a true and gentle wife.
Then, you know, I used my eyes;
She believed me every word,
Almost said she loved me—Jove!
Such a voice I never heard!—
Gave me some symbolic flower,
Had a meaning, oh, so sweet!
Don't know where it is, I'm sure,
Must have dropped it on the street.
How I spooned! and she—ha! ha!—
Well, I know it wasn't right;
But she did believe me so,
That I—kissed her. Pass a light."

"Mollie Meade, well, I declare!
Who'd have thought of seeing you,
After what occurred last night,
Out here on the avenue?
Oh, you awful, awful girl!

There, don't blush; I saw it all."
"Saw all what?" "Ahem—last night—
At the Mathers', in the hall."
"Oh, you horrid! where were you?
Wasn't he an awful goose?
"Most men must be caught; but he Ran his neck right in the noose.
I was almost dead to dance;
I'd have done it if I could;
But old Gray said I must stop,
And I promised ma I would;
So I looked up sweet and said
I had rather talk with him.
Hope he didn't see my face;
Luckily, the lights were dim.
Then, oh, how he squeezed my hand!
And he looked up in my face
With his great, big, lovely eyes.
Really, it's a dreadful case.
He was all in earnest, too;
But I really thought I'd have to laugh,
When he kissed a flower I gave,
Looking, oh, like such a calf!
I suppose he has it now
In a wineglass on his shelves.
It's a mystery to me
Why men will deceive themselves.
'Saw him kiss me!' Oh, you wretch!
Well, he begged so hard for one,
And I thought there'd no one know—
So I let him, just for fun.
I know it wasn't really right
To trifle with his feelings, dear;
But men are such conceited things,
They need a lesson once a year."

—Appleton's Journal.

—Returning home late the other night, a gentleman living on Mission street dierobed without lighting the gas, and lay peacefully down beside the partner of his joys. Sinking back upon the pillow, he straightway raised himself again and remarked: "I say, wife! how's your pillow? Warm?" "Why, what a foolish question," returned she, "my pillow is all right." "Is it real warm?" he asked.
"Certainly it is; I've had my head on it for three hours." Apparently satisfied, he lay down, and was silent for some time, when a vigorous nudging in the side of his wife proved that he had another idea. "I say—wife!" "For goodness' sake, what do you want?" petulantly answered that sleepy dame. "I say! you don't use no hair oil do you?" "Of course not. You know that as well as anybody.
Do for mercy's sake go to sleep." A half hour passed in silence, broken only by the solemn ticking of the clock in the darkness. Then there was another epasmodic nudging: "I say—wife! You didn't put the calf under this bed to-night, did you?" "Gracious me!" returned the matron, "what is the matter with you?
Of course the calf is not under the bed. Will you never go to sleep?" "Well," continued her lord, sliding his legs sidewise out of the bed, "I'm d—d if there aint something alive under here." There were the sound of a scrabbling round, a partial upheaval of the couch, the quick gleam of a white garment making for the open window, through which it disappeared, a thrashing round in the rose bushes outside—and all again was still. The custody of the children has been awarded to the husband.

—The Art Review is, upon the whole, a creditable publication. It is very decently illustrated, and has some very fair literature, agreeably adulterated with much stuff. For example, the August number informed the curious world that Prentice Mulford is editing the Figaro—which we had supposed was a Parisian journal; and Prentice, we had thought, was a Californian. As a help to art, the publication is probably of some usefulness; but a careful perusal of it fails to entirely confirm one's first good impression. It is published by J. J. Ormand & Co., New York and Chicago.

—On Tuesday evening last, the Rev. Dr. Thompson delivered a lecture at the Howard Presbyterian Church entitled Words about Words. The discourse was vox et præterea nihil—it was words, words, words; and if a word is sufficient unto the wise, the Rev. Doctor's lecture would have cloyed a Senate of Solons. In the matter of sense the Rev. Doctor exercised a rigid economy.

Communism and Positivism.

In the new number of the Fortnightly Review Mr. Frederick Harrison writes of the Commune with more than his usual force and less than his usual violence. The concluding passages of the article are well worth attention. "The great crisis," he says, "has started though it has not solved the problem. What in a few words is this problem? It is this—In this complex industrial system wealth has discovered the machinery by which the principal—in some cases the whole—results of common labor becomes its special perquisites. Ten thousand miners delve and toil, giving their labor, risking their lives. Ten masters give their direction or their capital—oftenest only the latter—and in a generation the ten capitalists are rioting in vast fortunes, and the ten thousand workmen are rotting in their graves or in a workhouse; and yet the ten thousand were at least as necessary to the work as the ten. Yet more. The ten capitalists are practically the law-makers. The Magistrates, the Government, the educators of youth, the priests of all creeds are their creatures. Practically they make and interpret the law—the law of the land, the law of opinion, and the law of God. They are masters of the whole social forces. A convenient faith has been invented for them by moralists and economists—the only faith which in these days they at all believe in—the faith that the good of mankind is somehow promoted by a persevering course of selfishness. Competition is in fact the whole duty of man, and thus it comes that in ten thousand ways the whole social force is directed for the benefit of those who live in this favored land. Whilst the owner of the soil knows no other toil or care but that of providing fresh modes of enjoyment, the peasant, out of whose sweat his luxury is wrung, lives like a beast of burden and dies like a dog in a ditch. Whilst the merchant Prince is courting society for a Peerage, a thousand lives of seamen are lost, decayed in rotten ships to sea. Whilst mine owners can still paralyze the Legislature, a thousand lives are lost each year in pits, chiefly, it is said, from preventable causes; and whilst fortunes are reared by iron-masters a hundred thousand workmen are ground to dust by trucks. Turn to the remedy. The workmen propose that the whole social force which so long, they say, has been directed by capital in its own interests, shall be directed by workmen in the interests of workmen; the power of the State shall step in to neutralize competition, and to restrain the selfish abuse of capital. The land at any rate, they say, must be resumed by the State for the benefit of the whole community, and formed on social and not proprietary right. Ultimately, in short, the whole existence of capital and the ordering the lives of the community must be subject to the will of social authority. Such is the faith which, in spite of its extravagance, has seized the foremost minds of the workmen of Europe—which, in some form or other, receives the devotion of a religious creed. Can any one doubt its strength compared with the conscious corruption of the opposite creed? Does the selfish cunning of competition in its heart think it can stand a social energy like this, with all its errors and all its dangers? Does a society which lives in its equipages and toils only in amusement match itself seriously with men who are ready thus to die for a cause, however mistaken? The issue is not doubtful; and, since this social problem must some day be faced by all, it seems time for serious men to reflect what other solution remains. Communism stares them in the face; it grows and deepens. Whatever it may suit a journalist to say, no sensible man believes that two hundred thousand men who voted for the Commune are bandits and fiends in human shape. The Commune of Paris has a great purpose, and it has great leaders. They have sworn that the exploitation of the workman shall end, and it must. They are not so clear about a substitute, but so far as they have a scheme it is Communism. There is but one alternative—the answer of Positivism. In one sense Positivism is akin to Communism, for it heartily accepts its belief in social reorganization. In another it is the opposite of Communism, for it exalts instead of abolishes the exercise of property by individuals. Positivism teaches that the highest uses of society are best served by massing capital in aggregates, and by entrusting these masses to the free control of individuals. It teaches that the dignity of domestic life and of public action, that moral as well as intellectual energy, demand the existence of capitalists as a class. It shows that the highest functions of social life and the noblest powers of the character would cease to exist without the free control of capital. It insists on this freedom in no grudging or unreal spirit. It looks on capital simply as power, and the right exercise of power as the noblest function of man, and the truthful respect of power as the most generous of human instincts. It insists that the use of property must again be made a religious duty—that capital arises from the combination of many efforts and must in justice minister to the common wants. It would by an education prolonged through life to teach the workmen of every grade to trust and aid the owner of capital to look on himself as the minister of a free community. It would train the rich to rely on their own resources, and compel them to use their full responsibility in so ordering the common industry that the fewest disasters and the least suffering befall the laboring community. Such is a picture of capital, not extinguished but moralized—not cut in pieces but raised to new functions—not harrassed by the fetters of law but strong in the noble consciousness of a public office. Let capital, shrinking from the fires and shambles of Paris, choose which of these two it will have. Communism is a not impossible future—Positivism is not an impossible future—the status quo is impossible; the alternative is Communism or Positivism.

Sea-Weed.

When descends on the Atlantic	So when storms of wild emotion
The gigantic	Strike the ocean
Storm-wind of the equinox,	Of the poet's soul, ere long
Landward in his wrath he scourges	From each cave and rocky fastness,
The toiling surges,	In its vastness,
Laden with sea-weed from the rocks;	Floats some fragment of a song;
From Bermuda's reefs; from edges	From the far-off isles enchanted
Of sunken ledges,	Heaven has planted
In some far-off bright Azore;	With the golden fruit of Truth;
From Bahama, and the dashing,	From the dashing surf whose vision
Silver-flashing	Gleams elysian
Surges of San Salvador;	In the tropic clime of Youth;
From the tumbling surf, that buries	From the strong Will and the Endeavor
The Orkneyan skerries,	That forever
Answering the hoarse Hebrides;	[ing Wrestles with the tide of Fate;
And from the wrecks of ships, and drift	From the wreck of hopes far-scattered,
Spars, uplifting	Tempest-shattered,
On the desolate, rainy seas;	Floating waste and desolate;
Ever drifting, drifting, drifting	Ever drifting, drifting, drifting
On the shifting	O. the shifting
Currents of the restless main;	Current of the restless heart;
Till in sheltered coves and reaches	Till at length in books recorded,
Of sandy beaches	They, like hoarded
All have found repose again.	Household words, no more depart.

The Order for the Execution of Christ.

The burning of the Archiepiscopal Palace at Bourges, following so close on the conflagration at Nancy, naturally inspires great alarm for other buildings. The palace at Bourges, built in the Louis XVI. style, was of no architectural value in itself, but it contained works of art and manuscripts of inestimable price. The most remarkable document in the Bishop's collection was, without doubt, the order for the execution of Jesus Christ, which was the personal property of the family De la Tour D'Auvergne. The order runs thus:

"Jesus of Nazareth, of the Jewish tribe of Judah, convicted of imposture and rebellion against the divine authority of Tiberius Augustus, Emperor of the Romans, having for the sacrilege been condemned to die on the cross by sentence of the Judge, Pontius Pilate, on the prosecution of our Lord Herod, Lieutenant of the Emperor in Judea, shall be taken to-morrow morning, the 23d day of the Ides of March, to the usual place of punishment, under the escort of a company of the Pretorian Guard. The so-called King of the Jews shall be taken out by the Stranean Gate. All the public officers and the subjects of the Emperor are directed to lend their aid to the execution of this sentence. (Signed) CAPEL.

"JERUSALEM, 22d day of the Ides of March, Year of Rome, 783."

Another curious document, supposed to be lost with others, relating to the time when Charles VII., driven from Paris by the Duke of Bedford, was called King of Bourges, is the will of the celebrated silversmith and speculator, Jacques Cœur, who advanced money to His Majesty, was afterwards thrown into prison, robbed, and finally banished the kingdom, accused of extortion. The oratory of the palace contained a Madonna of Raphael, and a Descent from the Cross, by Titian.—Correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette.

— Christian philanthropy is sadly shocked at the barbarity of some Indians up in the interior, who have sepulchred a living baby along with its dead mother. Inasmuch as this has always been the custom of the tribe, and they seem to like it, we are justified in the inference that it is one in some way adapted to their needs—that it supplies some want of their nature. As they do not seek to impose the custom upon us, we do not see how it is any of our business. If Christian philanthropy would be more tolerant it could itself be more tamely tolerated.

— Since the passage of the law taxing incomes, there have been collected from this source $332,000,000. When it is considered that it has cost but $340,000,000 to collect this amount, the wisdom of the measure becomes conspicuously apparent. "Sam, did you sell them 'taters?" "Yes, father." "Did you buy back the sack?" "Yes, father." "What did you get fer the 'taters?" "Seventy-five cents, father." "What did you pay for the sack?" "One dollar, father." "Sam, you're a financier; give me the money."

Special Brevities.

— At the time of the "Derby" there is always a dispute on this subject, and it may interest some of your readers to know that Darby is the correct pronunciation. The natives of Derbyshire call their county Darbyshire, and its chief town Darby, and the Earl's name is usually pronounced in the same way. In Yorkshire the dwellers by the Derwent call the river Darwent, and the stream of the same name in the South of England is spelled and pronounced Darent. Why is this? It would seem that this way of pronouncing a name which is of the earliest antiquity indicates that we have changed the pronunciation of the letter e, and that the "natives" have preserved it.—Notes and Queries.

— The first tee-totaler in Great Britain is still living in the person of John King, a Quaker seventy-five years old. He has been for many years an employe on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railroad, but is now superannuated. He has received a silver medal for his merits as first tee-totaler, and now it is proposed that all the brethren of that ilk in the United Kingdom should contribute a penny apiece as a testimonial to the old king of tee-totalers, thereby providing liberally for his declining years. He has not been temperate in all things, having had four wives, and is now living with the last, a young woman.

— An incident occurred at a late agricultural feast which we may here relate. A Mr. Dempster had one year offered an apology for drinking toast and water, by stating that he was an invalid. At the following meeting, one of his farmers followed his landlord's example of abstinence. "Why," said the President, addressing him, "aren't you taking your glass, James?" "Excuse me, Maister Dempster," said the farmer, "for I'm an infidel." "Ah!" rejoined Mr. Dempster, "you differ from the old-time infidels, who said, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.'"

— Victor Emmanuel met recently at Naples an old soldier, who handed him the memorandum-book which his father, King Carlo Alberto, had lost at the disastrous battle of Novara. The Sardinian Government had offered, at the time, a large reward for the recovery of the memorandum-book, which contained a great many valuable autograph notes from the king. The old soldier, who had picked it up on the battle-field, had not found out, until quite recently, whom it had formerly belonged to.

— The old Queen was not only assailed with yells as she passed along the street, but the vile practice was applied to her of spitting, which had been introduced at late elections; and she complained of it at the Palace in her broken English, but in very plain and expressive terms: "My lords, I be fifty years or more in this country and well respected; but now I be shspit on."

Eva's Tears.

Over a little mound
 Poor Eva stooped and mourned, day after day.
 They told her she would mourn her life away;
 The summer sunlight fell upon her hair,
 And still her sobs went shivering through the air—
 A sad, low sound.
 And still poor Eva wept.
 "My child is dead!" she moaned, "my little one,
 I cannot bear to live my life alone—
 My child is dead!" she moaned and moaned again,
 Until, worn out by many nights of pain,
 Poor Eva slept.
 And in her sleep she dreamed.
 'Twas Paradise, she said, and to and fro
 Passed angels radiant with bliss, and, lo!
 Her own lost child moved slowly through the band;
 He bore a burden in his little hand,
 Heavy it seemed—
 A vase both large and deep.
 "What bearest thou, my dearest one," asked she.
 "My mother's tears," he answered, wearily.
 Eva awoke. The sun smiled on the flowers,
 But never more through all the lonely hours
 Did Eva weep.

A Golden Legend.

Hard by a hospital—so legends tell—once on a time a duck there chanced to dwell. There, where no care nor want could e'er intrude, she laid her eggs, and reared her quacking brood. There would obsequious attendants dress, to charm her appetite, the savory mess; there, after showers, the nutritious worm upon the grass-plot temptingly would squirm, or devious beetles, wandering at will, find a sarcophagus within her bill.

Year after year her way that duck pursued, laid the dusk egg and hatched the yellow brood, swam in the pond, and scrambled in the dust, of spotless fame, of honored life and just. The cock-gallina, a most desperate rake, would often compliment her spouse the drake, and vow how much he envied him his luck in the possession of that virtuous duck! Nay, e'en the peacock on occasion would admit that, though not beauteous, she was good; so much did probity with him prevail who bore the eyes of Europe in his tail!

Alas, that it should be my fate to tell how from its high estate such virtue fell: how o'er that hapless and devoted form descended ruin in a fatal storm.

In the yard wall where towards the street it faced an iron box had been securely placed, with open mouth that bid the passer stop and for the charity a trifle drop, this fronted to the road I ought to state, within the yard was but a metal plate, close beside which, as oft of late was seen, the chief resort of that frail duck had been.

Well, time went on, until, as was her way, she brought her new-hatched progeny to day. Ah, then what wonder o'er the poultry stole, what poignant anguish pierced the drake's sad soul! No shovel bills his anxious glances meet, no trace of spreading webs upon their feet. Scandal awoke the feathered crowd among, and Rumor in sly corners wagged her tongue; while twixt the drake and his once trusted wife were seen the tokens of domestic strife. Nor long in secret the sore quarrel slept, but all the horror into public leapt, as day by day the heedless small ones grew more like gallinas less like ducklings true. At length the game-cock—he was high Penzance—was called upon to hear the drake advance his reasons for demanding a decree whereby his wife from him divorced should be.

And here, to give our daily press a hint; Divorce reports I must decline to print; the horrid details with unwholesome spice I omit, and for the nasty give the rust. Forth from the court the hapless duck was thrust, disgraced, abandoned, humbled to the dust.

Not long did she survive the dreadful day, and, when she on the straw expiring lay, thus to a charitable hen she told how all her sorrow had been due to gold: "Alas, one day as by the wall I sought to feed my ducklings as a mother ought, across the bricks I saw a beetle hie to seek a refuge from my hungry eye. In vain! I followed swiftly on his track and drew him struggling from a sheltering crack. Beneath the iron-box this crack had been left by the mortar falling from between; and when my bill I in the crevice thrust, I broke unwittingly the flakes of rust, and through the troacherous plate's unheeded flaw I chanced a golden coin, alas, to draw. From that sad hour and that mischance I date my recent down and my present fate. I sought the treasure-chest day after day and bore another glittering prize away; ah, hateful money of my death the cause, that wrings my conscience and my gizzard gnaws!"

With that she gave one quack and left this sphere, and thus the mystery was at last made clear. She had the coins feloniously attached, and thus it was that guinea fowls she had hatched. And here's a moral while the theme I am on—"Be ware how you devote yourself to Mammon."

— Business during the past fortnight has been more or less interfered with by politics. In regard to the past four months, we here repeat a recent remark made to us by a prominent Front street merchant. He said, "You will find upon inquiry of leading grocery houses, that more goods have been sold by them, day by day, during the past four months, than they could put up and ship each following day." Trade and commerce are rapidly expanding upon the Pacific Coast. Take, for instance, the single article of tea, and read the market report thereon. See the increased consumptive demand for sugar upon this coast; our expanding coffee trade, etc.; then look at the vast inland commerce that is being rapidly developed by the Pacific Railway; and then, when we consider that San Francisco, though not twenty-two years old, is the tenth largest city of the American Union, we may readily look forward to still more remarkable expansion within the next decade.—

— On the proposed Transmission of Bills of Lading by Telegraph, a letter in London Public Opinion says: At first sight this sounds very startling; but on a closer acquaintance it appears as if nothing could be simpler. At present, of course, these documents are usually sent by post. The innovation suggested is that provision should be made to enable them to be sent by telegraph. The necessary provision is shown to be that offices should be established at the two ends of the wire, and that at the one office the original document should be canceled by means of a stamp, and at the other, a new document written out with a certificate of the cancelation of the document of which it is a copy. It would thus become possible to send by telegraph all remittances which are now sent by post. I should be glad to hear from some of your readers who are concerned in commercial matters, as to how far it is desirable or practicable that such a system should be adopted.

— The great ocean tea race this year between the Earl King and the Craigforth steamers resulted in favor of the former. The Craigforth left Hankow June 3d, and arrived in London August 3d. The Earl King left after the Craigforth, and arrived July 31. This was very satisfactory for the steamers, but the cargoes were very poor and notted a loss of 2d. per pound. The question arises: Is it better to bet on the steamers than invest in the cargoes?

— By associate telegram, the Commercial Herald learns that a sample of California hops was sold in New York at 75 cents. This is of course merely a fancy price; 800 bales are reported as sold here, for shipment to New York, at from 25c. to 30 cents.

— Carl Schurz, who stands at the head of the German-American politicians of the highest type, used the following sensible and highly patriotic language in his speech in Chicago: "Nothing could be further from me than the idea of a separate political organization of the Germans in this Republic. Here we are American citizens, neither more nor less; and German pride should inspire us here only to the determination to be counted among the best of American citizens. We have no separate interests here, and we should have no separate aims. Our interests are no other than those of all, and our aims should be no other than those of the public welfare."

— We met a man the other day wearing a steel shirt bosom. With an air of conscious pride he pointed out its varied advantages: it never needed washing, could be worn with a soiled shirt, and the like. We have conceived a profound respect for that practical man. We recognize in him the exponent of all Sham. Were it not that we fear the steel of his shirt is not all in front, our admiration should be expressed in a manner that would exalt him.

— We have learned of a prevalent swindle, and not having been taken into it we hasten to expose it. People burying relatives at the cemetery have taken to "boning" the bodies, as turkeys are boned. This is to defraud the doctors, who resurrect the cadavers for the skeletons. A medical friend assures us that the last body he snatched could have been wound about a spade-handle, and was of no earthly use. He fed it to his hogs.

— We have trustworthy information that Horace Greeley is coming to California to tell what he knows about mining. Afterward he will go to Alaska and tell what he knows about seal fishing. We should be pleased to hear from Mr. Greeley what he knows about editing a newspaper, and the devil would be delighted to receive some instruction in lying.

— Neapolitan coral fishers this year have been very successful; but there is no chance of the prices being lowered, so increasing is the demand for this article since American tourists arrive in Naples in such numbers. Good pink coral is now worth about fifty times its weight in gold.—Times.

Paris Bacchante.

Magdalene of cities you call me, Bacchante, I tell you, not Woman;
 And know not the wine in my blood— It is ichor, not blood, in my veins;
 Bacchante! Nor Christian, nor human— The Brute-god at least is not human,
 Bacchante! Nor evil nor good. Nor I, his child, bound by your chains.

"Repentant?" Because men desired me. "Duty?" My duty is living.
 "Sobered?" Can wine be made drunk? "Right?" Can immortals be bound?
 "Remorseful?" Does ocean lament him These rules are for you serfs of heaven—
 That a ship in his bosom has sunk! For you who return to the ground.

For me, I am Paris Bacchante—
 Paris, the late child of Pan;
 Left behind in a world that had tired him
 With its Faiths, and its Duties, and Man.

Interesting Facts about Cholera.

Some few years ago Dr. Guy, Professor of Hygiene at King's College, London, drew attention to the fact that an outbreak of cholera was often preceded by a milder epidemic—influenza. The prevalence of the latter malady during the past winter and spring may seem to have been amply accounted for by the exceptional severity of those seasons, but nevertheless, it has its significance and its warning. Both epidemics have this in common—that they progress in fatality to a certain point, and then gradually subside. They are not subject to the same fluctuations as bronchitis and diarrhea—fluctuations due to changes of temperature or other evident causes—but are to a very considerable extent independent of the ordinary influences of heat and cold. There is certainly no resemblance between the present year and the year 1854, when the last cholera epidemic prevailed. In 1854 the drought was general, and although during the month of July there was much rain, yet the year altogether was a very dry one, and from the commencement of March extraordinarily warm. The progress of the malady when once it reached our shores (for there can be no doubt it was imported) was very remarkable. Till the middle of July hardly a case was known, but before the end of that month the deaths had risen from five to one hundred and thirty-three. The disease went on increasing week by week, it reached its maximum mortality of two thousand and fifty. It took thirteen weeks to fall again to five, and during the whole period of twenty-one weeks there was no fluctuation in its progress and then in its decline. This feature is one of the most striking characteristics of the plague, and harmonizes with the theory that both are imported diseases. Evidently, therefore, the first duty of the Government is to watch the ports, for, whether contagious or not, cholera is not an epidemic of home growth. It is an unwelcome guest, which can be best dismissed at the very threshold.—Pall Mall Gazette.

— About the most ludicrous incident that we remember occurred the other day in an ordinarily solemn village in the cow counties. A worthy ma'tron, who had been absent looking after a vagrom cow, returned home, and pushing against the door found it obstructed by some heavy substance, which, upon examination, proved to be her husband. He had been slaughtered by some roving joker, who had wrought upon him with a pick-handle. To one of his ears was pinned a scrap of greasy paper, upon which were scrambled the following sentiments in pencil-tracks: "The inqulosed boddie is that uv old Bunker. Step litely, stranger, fer yer lize the mortil part uv wat you mns be sum da. Thers arrest for the weery! If Bunker heddenta wurkt agin me for Corner I wuddenta hed to sit on him. Ov setch is the kingum uf hevun! You don't want to moov this boddie til me summons to hold a ninqwest. Or! flesh are gras!" The ridiculous part of the story is that the lady did not wait to summon the Coroner, but took charge of the remains herself; and in dragging them toward the bed she exploded into her face a shotgun, which had been cunningly contrived to discharge by a string connected with the body. Thus was she punished for an infraction of the law. The next day the particulars were told us by the factions Coroner himself, whose jury had just rendered a verdict of accidental drowning, in both cases. We do not know when we have enjoyed a heartier laugh at genuine California humor.

— Mr. Silas A. White, Principal of the Valencia-street Cosmopolitan School, has addressed to the Board of Education a note which is strictly grammatical. From which we infer that Mr. White must have been lately sipping at the educational spigot which it is his function to turn for the little ones. Mr. White will remember that quite recently he executed an epistle to the Board, in which there was a lively contest between bad orthography, bad syntax and bad sense. Having somewhat sharply criticized his former effort, we have deemed it but simple justice to award him this present praise, for which he is expected to manifest a deep and grammatical gratitude.

Phoebe Cary.

Six months ago we noticed in these columns the death of our esteemed contributor, the poetess Alice Cary; and now we are compelled to announce the departure of her sister, Phoebe Cary, whose articles, both in verse and prose, have often graced the Journal. She died at Newport, Rhode Island, July 31st, after an illness of about two months. She was six years younger than Alice, and was born in 1825, in the neighborhood of Cincinnati. The sisters came to New York in 1852, and lived together here until they were separated by the death of Alice. They wrote much together, and, of the "Poems of Alice and Phoebe Cary," published in 1850, about one-third was written by Phoebe. In 1854 Phoebe published "Poems and Parodies," a volume in which Alice had no share. Her latest and best work was "Poems of Faith, Hope and Love," published in 1868. Her last contribution to the Journal was a story called "The Two Lovers," which we printed about five months ago. The prominent features of her poetry, as of her personal character, are strong religious faith and cheerful confidence in God and in a future existence. The following hymn is a good specimen of her style and sentiment:

"NEARER HOME.

One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er;
I'm nearer my home to-day
Than I ever have been before;
Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the crystal sea;
Nearer the bound of life,
Where we lay our burdens down;
Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer gaining the crown.

But the waves of that silent sea
Roll dark before my sight,
That brightly the other side
Break on a shore of light.

Oh, if my mortal feet
Have almost gained the brink,
If it be I am nearer home
Even to-day than I think!

Father, perfect my trust,
Let my spirit feel in death
That her feet are firmly set
On the Rock of a living faith."

— His Hirsute Absurdity, the Great Unknown, having sickened of the honesty business, in which there was no stimulating competition, has betaken himself to Salt Lake City and gone into swindling, in which there is a great deal. His principal competitor there will be Bentham Fabian, in whom he will find the powerful opposition that a new house always experiences from a long established concern. The Unknown has, as was to have been expected, gone into the "hair restorative" line, and is driving a thrifty trade among the Latter Day Saints, prematurely pious, bald, and the old time sinners, who have grown nude-pated from natural drought. As long as he was tolerated in San Francisco, the unpleasant wretch vehemently denied that he ever resorted to anything but simple irrigation with ditch water. Now, however, in the "circular" before us, he maintains that the marvelous wealth of wool upon his frowsty pow has been produced by the stinking nostrum he dispenses at two dollars per bottle. We learn that he is making a very good thing of it at present, but our word for it Mr. Fabian will manage to circumvent him in the end, and spoil the spoiler of his prey. The latter gentleman is not one to quietly tolerate so vigorous an incursion into his own domain; and if the Unknown gets off with hair enough to stuff a locket, we shall abandon the prophecy business. It may be that the two have entered into partnership. If so, the Unknown will part with his nails and teeth also.

— A pedagogue in Indiana, who was "had up" for unmercifully welting the back of a little girl, justified his action by explaining that "she persisted in flinging paper pellets at him when his back was turned." That is no excuse. The Town Crier once taught school up in the mountains, and about every half hour had to remove his coat and scrape off the dried paper wads adhering to the nap. He never permitted a trifle like this to unsettle his patience; he just kept on wearing that gaberdine until it had no nap and the wads wouldn't stick. But when they took to dipping them in mud he made a complaint to the Board of Directors. "Young man," said the Chairman, "if you don't like our ways, you'd better sling your blankets and git. Prentice Mulford tort skule yer for more'n six months, and he never said a word agin the wads." The T. C. briefly explained that Mr. Mulford might have been brought up to paper wads, and didn't mind them. "It aint no use," said another Director, "the children hev got to be amused." The T. C. protested that there were other amusements quite as diverting; but the third Director here rose and remarked: "I perfectly agree with the Cheer; this youngster better travel. I consider as paper wads lies at the root uv poppillar edycation; ther a necessary adjunct uv the skool systim. Mr. Cheerman, I move and second thet this yer skoolmaster be shot." The T. C. did not remain to observe the result of the voting.

Court Chat.

— The correspondent of the Standard continues to write a great deal of nonsense about the Royal visit to Ireland. In his description of the ball given by the wife of the Mayor of Dublin, he says: "It would be invidious and considerably Yankeeish to single out any special fair one as the star of the evening, though one there was, the Lady Olive Guinness, daughter to the Earl of Bandon, who literally shone like a star from the brilliancy of her parure, and not only from that, but from the effulgence of her dark, Spanish-like beauty. Diamonds to the value of £20,000 shone on her person; and as she moved a glittering apparition, even in a throng where all was brilliant, 'There passes a star,' somebody exclaimed, loud enough to be heard. 'Yes, and a fixed star,' aptly added a wit of the town, referring to the fact that she was not an absentee, but had her mansion in Dublin Isle. Very fair they are, these Irish women, a healthy, rosy-cheeked, big-boned race, with much expressiveness in their countenances." The correspondent further writes: "There is a certain rude strength in build and in the contour of figure in some of these wild Irish girls; but what flashing orbs they have, and how coaxingly the brogue drops honey-like over the rim of the red lips." That brogue is dangerous in woman's mouth; there is a wheedling melody in it that overcomes a man before he knows where he is, and thrills him from the tips of his white kids to the soles of his patent leathers."

— The following touching anecdote of the unfortunate Charles X. has not appeared in print, but well deserves to be saved from oblivion. After residing in honorable exile at Holyrood Palace, in Edinburgh, for about two years, and endearing himself to all around him by his amiable, unostentatious manners, and profuse charities to the poor, the venerable monarch quitted Edinburgh with great regret, to seek another place of refuge in his last years of life and misfortune. It is generally understood that he was in a manner forced away by the Government. Certain it is that he had become greatly attached to Holyrood, and he left it with great sorrow and reluctance. A friend of mine paid a visit to Holyrood a few years after the royal departure, and learned from the old housekeeper that the day before the King left the palace, which he did on September 17th, 1832, she saw him from a small window alone in the flower-garden, which he had himself cultivated with great delight. He was gathering seeds of various flowers, and folding them up in little square papers which he had prepared. The tears were running down his aged cheeks, as he collected these simple memorials of his happy residence in Holyrood, to take with him to sow in his new place of exile at Goritz, where perhaps they flourished long after his hand could tend them, for he died there only four years afterwards, November 6th, 1836.

— In a letter recently received by a gentleman residing at Wavertree by his son, who is studying in Germany, the following passages occur: "We arrived at Elms at eight o'clock in the morning, after two hours' walk over the mountains from Coblenz. After taking coffee in the garden belonging to the hotel, we strolled about the town. While looking at the shops the King came past, and the master took off his hat, and I did too, though I did not know who he was. In one of the shops they sold his photo; and some of our boys were looking at them when the King passed. I suppose he saw we belonged to a school, as he stopped and asked one of the masters if we were English, and on hearing that we were, told the shopman to give us all a photo. of himself. The man said he would, and the King took up a few and gave them to us himself. I was standing next to him, so received one from his hands. It was very kind of him to give away £4 10s., which was the price of the cards. He was walking about like the other gentlemen, and talking to the ladies and some of us. He asked two or three and myself where we came from."

— The Marchioness de la Salle was charged at the Marlborough-street Police Court with stealing sketches to the value of £400, the property of the Baron de Magrath de Moyecque, a French nobleman now following the profession of an artist in this country. The prisoner was introduced to the prosecutor, alleging that she desired to take lessons in painting. The Baron now declared that she had abused his confidence by abstracting more than fifty of his sketches. Many of these were found in her possession, but a few were admitted to have been lent by the prosecutor. The Marchioness was remanded on bail. On her examination, after hearing some lengthy evidence, M. Gustave Doré being one of the witnesses, Mr. Newton said he was of opinion that no jury would find the prisoner guilty of stealing the drawings with the intention of disposing of them for her own use. It was a case of suspicion, and quite right that it should be inquired into. The prisoner was discharged.

— A letter from Rangoon states that great amusement has been created in Burmah by the news of the reception given in England to the so-called "Burmese nobleman." There is no such thing as a Burmese nobleman, no hereditary rank save that of the King's family, which is large enough of itself to make a respectable order of nobility. His Majesty has from forty to fifty wives, and a family that would form a goodly House of Peers. Many of the officials, says the writer, are raised from the lowest rank, and often in a moment at that Sovereign's caprice are reduced to it again. The father of one of the so-called noblemen is said to be at this moment engaged in day labor. Of course neither father nor son is any the worse for that; the fun is in calling your visitors noblemen.

— The Emperor Napoleon has given a fiat at Chislehurst, at which telegrams were received from the Czar of Russia, the King of Sweden, the Emperor of Austria, the King of Portugal, the King of Holland, the Prince of Wales, and others.

— According to the Avenir Libéral, it has been decided, after a family council, that the Duc d'Anmale and the Prince de Joinville shall take their seats in the Chamber when it shall re-assemble after the vacation. The Comte de Paris was of opinion that his uncles should send in their resignation, in order that they might not afford the slightest pretext of causing difficulties to the Government. The Duc de Nemours, on the other hand, maintained that his brothers had the right and were bound to take an interest in public affairs, and that no consideration ought to prevent them from fulfilling their obligations as citizens. This view has prevailed, and in due time the Princes may be expected to present themselves in the National Assembly.

— On Monday Mr. Andrew Noel Agnew, eldest son of Sir Andrew Agnew, Bart., and Lady Louisa Agnew, attained his majority; and the first of a series of social entertainments was given on that day. It is worthy of special notice, as indicating the kind sympathy of the Agnew family with the young of the district, that the first entertainment was given to children. A general invitation had been sent to the several day schools, not only in the parishes of Leswalt and Kirkcolm, but also in the neighboring towns of Stranraer. There was a muster of upwards of nine hundred children, all of whom seemed thoroughly to appreciate the kindness shown to them.

— Lord Houghton, in a well-turned speech at the centenary in honor of Miss Hope Scott, the sole survivor of the line, mentioned the kind of loneliness in which the names of all the great littérateurs stand. They have rarely left descendants. We have no Shakspeare, no Milton, no Bacon, no Newton, no Pope, no Byron; Italy has no Dante, no Petrarch, no Ariosto, or Alfieri; Germany has no Goethe, no Schiller, no Heine; France has no Montaigne, no Descartes, no Voltaire, no Lamartine. There is no descendant known of Luther, Calvin, or John Knox.

— The Royal sojourn in Ireland which has just terminated has given an immense impetus to business of every kind in the metropolis, but a large proportion of those who have come to Ireland for the occasion are prolonging their stay, and intend to visit the beautiful lakes of Killarney, the wild grandeur of Connemara, or the Giant's Causeway, and last, though anything but least, the lovely scenery of Wicklow. Kingstown, too, and Bray, with their surroundings, may expect to be gay in the extreme during the remainder of the summer and autumn.

— The French Committee on the Budget has agreed to fix the salary of President Thiers at 500,000 francs, with a credit in addition for ordinary expenses and presents. A bill providing for the dissolution of the present Assembly will soon be brought forward. The Deputies of the Left are preparing a manifesto, demanding the restoration of the constitution of 1848. It is said that further loans will have to be obtained before the city of Paris is restored to its condition before the war.

— One of the matters to be decided at Gastein is said to be the marriage of the Grand Duke Alexis, third son of the late Emperor Alexander, with the daughter of Prince Frederick Charles. This question is to be treated first of all, and the consent of both parties will be the test of war or peace—the Russo-Franco-Americo against the Austrian-Prussian-Italian alliance, to pull one against the other, or all, as the case may be, together?

— The French deputation, headed by Count de Flavigny, who recently landed in Ireland, have crossed into England, and will visit the city of York. They are enthusiastically received everywhere. The object of the visit to the United Kingdom is personally to return the thanks of the French people for the aid so freely given by Englishmen and Irishmen for the wounded and suffering French during the war.

— The latest rumor at Inverary was that the Queen would make a sojourn of eight or ten days at the castle, with the Princess Louisa and the Marquis of Lorn, and that there would be an entertainment to the tenantry and others, followed by a ball, which Her Majesty would honor with her presence. It is probable that Prince Arthur may accompany Her Majesty.

— Sir Edward Thornton, the British envoy to Washington, who returned home on leave of absence a few days ago, has gone to Balmoral to take the oath to the Queen as a member of her Majesty's Privy Council.

— Bridget Flynn has been adjudged insane for believing that her sleeping apartment is infested with angels. Every child is taught to think that these things hang round his bedside with no very obvious business there. Bridget Flynn is undoubtedly insane. So is every one who believes at maturity what he has been taught in childhood.

— A correspondent of the Call directs attention to a soap swindle. We direct attention to another: manufacturers are addicted to the practice of boiling up their dead relatives; thus making a very inferior quality of soap, and so defrauding their customers and the other worms.

From the Song of the Willi--A Ballad.

[BY MATHILDE BLIND.]

The wild wind is whistling o'er moorland and heather,
 Heigho, heigho!

I rise from my bed, and my bed has no feather,
 Heigho, heigho!

My bed is deep down in the brown sullen mold,
 My head is laid low on the clod;
 So wormy the sheets, and the pillow so cold
 Of clammy and moist clinging sod.

The lone livid moon rideth high up in heaven,
 Heigho, heigho!
 The stars' cutting glitter their dull shrouds hath riven,
 Heigho, heigho!

I rise and I glide out far into the night,
 A shadow so swift and so still;
 Bleak, bleak is the moonshine all ghastly and white,
 The dank moraes drinketh its fill.

And down in yon valley, in wan vapor shrinking,
 Heigho, heigho!

The bare moated town cowers fitfully blinking,
 Heigho, heigho!

There warm under shelter, the fire burning bright,
 My lover sleeps sound in his bed:
 But I sit alone in the pitiless night,
 Unpitied, unloved, and unwed.

Walter Montgomery--A Startling Coincidence.

Walter Montgomery is no more—the brilliant, the versatile, the gifted actor; the still more exquisite reader. Who that has heard him read Poe's "Bells," or Dickens's "Pottleton Legacy," but will concede it. He who was delighting us with his masterly Shakesperian delineations so recently, has passed away, slaughtered by his own hand—a suicide—but three days wed. Sad is the brief story of the telegram. Sad as it is, it recalls an incident yet more sad, with which one season of his eventful life seemed so blended that it may not be inappropriate to refer to it here. Less than four years ago, a lady, youthful, beautiful, and of rare mental endowments, the pride and joy of a wide circle of admiring friends, weary of the humdrum life of a dull watering place, left her widowed mother and her native city to find in the bustle and stir of Melbourne a more congenial sphere. She applied to the manager of the leading theater there—the Theater Royal. Her beauty and talents at once secured for her a star engagement. Of the rôle she enacted in her too brief theatrical career for it lasted barely one season the character in which she achieved her greatest success was that of "Juliet;" this she played to Montgomery's "Romeo," with much sweet appreciation. It is generally conceded that his finest effort was as "Hamlet," but on this occasion it was rivaled by his "Romeo," and it was whispered that there was more of reality than fiction in the charming rendering of the love strains of the great poet. While the world was still singing the praises of the fair young debutante, a mournful, a sorrowful tale hushed the joy notes into mourning—a disappointed passion had deranged her life, and she, too, died by her own hand. It was rumored at first that poor Walter was the cause. A committee of gentlemen investigated the subject, and not only acquitted him, but found that another, who was the "source and fountain head of all her woe," was alike blameless. Who that thus witnessed these two gifted actors could have foreseen that the career of each one should have terminated with a tragedy stranger than the fiction of the poet? We may well say, with Shakespeare—

"For never was a story of more woe
 Than that of 'Juliet' and her 'Romeo.'"

From China to London.

A curious illustration of the relative merits of the rival lines of communication between England and Eastern Asia was furnished by the Korean expedition. One account, by a correspondent with the United States fleet, was sent to Shanghai, thence by mail to this city, where it was printed in the Call, telegraphed to New York, and from there forwarded by mail to London, where it appeared in the Times on the morning of August 2d. A similar account, copied from the North China Herald, was published in the Pall Mall Gazette on the afternoon of the same day, having been received by the French mail, via the Isthmus of Suez. The news, therefore, although transmitted in exactly opposite directions around the world, reached London at almost the same period of time. The distance by the American route is considerably greater than that via the Suez Canal.

The Two Dromios.

A very worthy couple lost by death, what, in their opinion, was a very valuable little boy, and over his grave they erected a monument, and into the marble was chiseled the following lines, expressive of their feelings of resignation and hope:

"We can't have always everything to please us,
Little Johnny has gone to Jesus."

Some ill-disposed and uncharitable neighbors, who did not at all admire Johnny while living or lament him when dead, underwrote the above epitaph with these words thusly:

"We can't sometimes almost always tell,
Perhaps little Johnny is gone to h—l."

Johnny Rosenfield and Johnny McGlynn, in the opinions of their respective parties, are pattern boys, who each deserve to be State Harbormaster for San Francisco. Some think Johnny is elected and some think John. The uncertainty of doubtful things was never more strongly illustrated than in the slowly coming returns. Johnny curses Father Gallagher and the Irish beeples and John damns the Dutch. Excitement runs high, and all the gamblers in politics are on the qui vive to learn whether the Teuton or the Gaul leads the list. It is the most important question that has ever agitated our community. It is not merely whether Johnny the Dutchman, or John the Irishman shall move vessels and sweep off the docks, and have the grain-sweepings for their chickens—not only whether the Republican or the Democratic party shall triumph in the election of their candidate, but it involves great questions of international law and dogmas of theological faith. What right had Louis Napoleon to declare war against Prussia? and if he had, did Bismarck do right when he burned Chateau Dun and bombarded Paris, and only made peace upon receiving millions of indemnity and Alsace and Lorraine. If the Pope is infallible, had Victor Emmanuel any right to seize Rome, take possession of the Palace of the Quirinal, and put his son on the throne of Spain, which Napoleon refused to the family of the Hohenzollern? Johnny believes in the house of the Hohenzos, and John believes in the Pope. If Johnny is elected, then Germany becomes a great consolidated empire, dominating Europe, retaining Alsace and Lorraine, seizing Luxembourg, Holland, and the half of Austria, forms a treaty with Russia, and menaces the peace of the world. If John gets the most votes, the Emperor Napoleon will return to the French throne, Alsace and Lorraine will be given back, the French boundary carried to the Rhine, the Pope's civil power will be restored, Victor Emmanuel driven out of the imperial city. The Carlists will dethrone Amadeus, and the infallibility will be recognized by the Catholics of Germany, and Father Gallagher will be entitled to a cardinal's hat for peddling tickets on election day—the regular Democratic ticket, scratched for John A. McGlynn. This is a very old quarrel, and has made a great deal of feeling between Johnny's ancestors and John's, and while we have no interest—that is no especial interest in the matter—we always thought that Johnny's ancestors were wrong in crucifying John's Josh between two thieves. But what is the use of keeping up this old feud? If Johnny Rosenfield will apologize for crucifying John A. McGlynn's Redeemer, return the clothes which were raffled off, and will stop remembering the seventh day to keep it holy, and will promise on his honor to behave like a Christian, and if John A. McGlynn will stop riding in Papal processions, and promise that when the next Pope celebrates his twenty-fifth anniversary that he won't be there, and will admit over his own signature that neither the Pope or the Devil can truly prophesy the result of an election, then this trouble can all be arranged satisfactorily to both parties. The Jewish and Christian churches can be united in one faith, and by adding another ball to the Synagogue, all can worship together. Europe will be restored to peace and harmony, the Republican party can secure the German vote, the Democracy retain the Irish, and all will be well. In order to make the reconciliation more complete, we would suggest that the wealthy Israelitish merchants who signed for Rosenfield and Rosenberg establish a new synagogue, of which Father Gallagher should be made Rabbi, and Alexander Badlam should be elected to the office of circumcisor. Then the lion and the lamb should lie down together, and a little child should lead them, "for of such is the kingdom of Heaven." Let Alexander Badlam remember, "we can't have always everything to please us," and John or Johnny, whichever gets beaten for Harbormaster, will realize the fact, "that one can't most always sometimes tell."

— Mr. Verbloom, of this city, who was supposed to have gone down in the City of Boston, has put in an appearance, very greatly to the astonishment of his wife. As that worthy lady had just received a thousand dollars on his life policy, his reception was not attended by any of those external signs with which frivolous natures are accustomed to manifest their joy. After the first start of surprise, the demeanor of his wife was calm, dignified and resigned—something like that of a serene jackass baffled of his turnip by a sudden and tempestuous pig.

Chloris' Tears.

A PASTORAL DITTY.

All down a dainty flowery mead
Colin was once a-straying,
And with his pipe the pretty birds
Did rival with his playing.

His bleating flock grazed at his side,
As slowly he was strolling;
Anon his voice would fill the grove,
Sweet Phillis' charms extolling.

In passing near a leafy bower,
He hears a mournful sighing,
And views upon a flower-decked bank
A charming nymph a-lying.

With doleful sobs and piteous sighs
Her snowy breasts were heaving,
Her pretty eyes with tears o'errun,
So sorely was she grieving.

"Fair Shepherdess," said Colin, "why
Art weeping, 'stead of joying?
Say, hast thou found thy shepherd false
And with another toying?"

"No, no!" she cried; "young Lubin's
And would not me be paining; [true,
No gentler shepherd roves the vale;
Of him I'm not complaining."

"Hast lost thy flock then, pretty one;
Are they untended roaming?
If so, I'll search each grove and field
And find them ere the gloaming."

"No, no!" she cried; "my lambs are
'Tis not for them I'm crying; [here,
I've lost my only chignon, and Another can't be buying."

—*London Figaro.The South African Diamonds.

Mr. James Thom, the Brazilian diamond cutter, has arrived at Pniet from Glasgow. We have learned from this gentleman two or three facts which will be of interest to our readers. Mr. Thom states that Cape diamonds are the hardest in the world—thus completely contradicting the assertions of interested persons in England, to the effect that our diamonds are unusually soft, and therefore of inferior value. We understand Mr. Thom to estimate Cape diamonds between Indian and Brazilian stones. He explains a matter which has frequently puzzled people with reference to the state in which diamonds are found here compared with their primitive state in other countries. When diamonds were first discovered here, we heard a great deal in the papers about the necessity of testing them with a file in order to ascertain their genuineness. It was soon found, however, that the veriest tyro in diamond seeking, having once seen a rough diamond, could never mistake a stone in future. Mr. Thom explains this by informing us that Brazilian and Oriental diamonds are almost invariably found with an almost opaque encrustation upon them; and in order correctly to test the stone it is necessary to rub off a portion of this crust by means of a file or machine made for the purpose, so that the interior of the stone is made visible. Mr. Thom brought out such a machine with him, but finding from the mass of stones shown him in Port-Elizabeth that no such encrusted gem is found in the South African mines, he left it in the latter town, as being perfectly useless here. South African diamonds, says Mr. Thom, bear Nature's own polish; a fact, he adds, which is causing astonishment to experts all over the world. He further tells us that he saw in the hands of Mr. Piper, of Klip Drift, recently, a diamond to which he has seen none equal during the last thirty years.—Diamond News.

— The other day, at Memphis, a man with a double shotgun entered a dry-goods store, and looked earnestly at a salesman, who, of course, quailed and crawled under the counter. The invader advanced, poked his infernal machine over the boards, and exploded it downward into the protruding leg of the latent counter-jumper. And all this was by way of vengeance for a broken promise of marriage to the shotgunner's sister, whom, in all other important respects, this sinful tapeman had ruined. We never expect to comprehend the ways of big brothers. You begin running their sisters, and when you think you have gone on as long as a gentleman ought to, their brothers won't let you stop. They insist that in addition to the unpleasantness of incurring your affliction, their sister shall endure the deep disgrace of contracting your name. If we had a sister, and a shop clerk were working her an eternal woe, he might leave off at any stage of the proceedings.

— An Iowa preacher is on trial upon a charge of frightening a boy to death. We regret the lack of details; it is not stated how the deed was done. It is likely that the man of God found the boy in weak bodily condition, and produced his regular pyrotechnic hell for the purpose of searing him into heaven, as tigers are driven away by fire. The reverend gentleman probably ignited too many fireworks at a time, and accomplished his purpose sooner than he had intended. Had he been more temperate in the expenditure of his caloric, that boy might have lived to pay a great deal of money into the church.

Rumored Abandonment of Cochin China.

Notwithstanding some circumstances, which seem to give color to the rumor which has now been revived, we cannot believe that the French Government will ever resolve on withdrawing from Cochin China. It would be a suicidal act to do so. Not only are the mineral resources of the country almost unexplored, and its agriculture and manufactures comparatively undeveloped, but whatever has from time to time been added to our stock of information and experience on these points has been highly encouraging. By all recent accounts, the natives are becoming more friendly to foreigners every day, and the great number of excellent harbors and valuable products would seem certain to attract an ever-increasing foreign trade. It is possible that the French possessions may not at present "pay," in that narrow sense of the word which regards only the time being, but the experiment has not yet had a fair trial. The feeble attempts made by some European nations to establish a regular trade were frustrated by the long internal wars of the eighteenth century, and the commerce of Cochin China was limited to its intercourse with China. Since the establishment of Singapore, however, the case is altered, and by communication with Bangkok another channel of commerce was opened up, which only requires a little time and energy to develop. To withdraw from such a country at the present moment would be to cast away an unknown advantage, which can never be regained without greater difficulty than before. The effect of such a withdrawal would, moreover, be prejudicial to the prestige of European nations in the East, as disturbing the network of commerce, and giving the anti-foreign party an excuse for depreciating us.—London and China Express.

Female Doctors.

In New York city, so far as we can learn, there are some twenty female doctors, and in the country at large, as we estimate from data in our possession, there are not less than two hundred in all. There is in New York one female doctor whose income from her profession is $20,000 year; and there must be at least a dozen others whose annual incomes range from $5,000 to $10,000. There is a female doctor who has a son also a doctor, and he has a wife who is also a doctor. There is a female doctor in Buffalo, who has a husband also a doctor, and the professional income of the wife is twice as much as that of her husband. There is a female doctor in Orange, New Jersey, whose professional returns, for many years past, have ranged from $15,000 to $20,000 a year. There are also female doctors in Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, and other cities, with very large incomes from their practice; but it is not in our power to give anything like precise statements regarding them. Now, we don't propose to discuss the propriety of women becoming doctors; but it is certain that, judged by pecuniary and professional standards, there are not a few of them who have been amazingly successful. The male practitioners now look on their professional sisters with much greater leniency than they did in former times, and many are quite ready to enter into consultation with them in difficult cases, though several of the medical societies have prohibited this custom. There are abundant signs that a much larger number of women will enter into the practice of medicine in coming years than have thus far entered into it; and it looks as though, before another generation, the maladies of women would be almost exclusively treated by professional members of their own sex.

— The King of Burmah has announced that he is printing a complete edition of the Three Beedagaths (the Tripitaka—i. e., the Buddhist Bible) in Pali, the sacred language, with a view of having it afterward done into English, "so as to spread the knowledge of the Buddhist religion in Europe and America." This is an excellent idea. Owing to our deplorable ignorance of Buddhism we are all in danger of being cast into the Buddhist hell, with all the nations that forget Buddha. If there is anything we need, it is a nice, intelligible religion—one that we can be proud of. Buddhism ought to have a run of at least five centuries. By that time we suppose the scientists would get after it.

— For the trifling domestic irregularity of becoming drunk and disagreeable, old daddy Harrison, of Philadelphia, has had a sword poked through him by his son, a peace-loving youth of temperance preferences. That is what comes of letting one's boys join the cold water movement. O, parent, parent! if so be that thy son is become a shining light in the Dashaway Association, let not the effulgence of his career blind thee to the dangers thereof. When thou shalt get drunk and strive against thine own household, he shall impale thy vitals with his rapier, or bisect thy body with a claymore. Go beat him on the head with a pump-handle until he expire.

Joaquin Miller's Poems.

Harriet Prescott Spofford, in reviewing Miller's poems, concludes her notice with the following remarks and quotations in the September number of Old and New:

After all, as we close the covers, we are conscious that the topmost reach of appreciative welcome and acclaim cannot meet the demand of what is best in this book and this man; and out of the fullness of the heart we feel sure that there can be but one triumphant answer to the question asked in the exquisite and touching poem addressed to Maud:

"Because the skies were blue, because The sun in fringes of the sea Was tangled, and delightfully Kept dancing on as in a waltz, And tropic trees bowed to the seas, And bloomed and bore years through and through, And birds in blended gold and blue Were thick and sweet as swarming bees. And sang as if in Paradise, And all that Paradise was spring, Did I, too, sing with lifted eyes, Because I could not choose but sing. "With garments full of sea-winds, blown From isles beyond of spice and balm, Beside the sea, beneath her palm,	She waits as true as chiseled stone. My childhood's child, my June in May! So wiser than thy father is, These lines, these leaves, and all of this, Are thine—a loose, uncouth bouquet. So wait and watch for sail and sign; A ship shall mount the hollow seas, Blown to thy place of blossomed trees And birds and song and summer-shine. I throw a kiss across the sea; I drink the winds as drinking wine, And dream they all are blown from thee; I catch the whispered kiss of thine. Shall I return with lifted face, Or head held down as in disgrace, To hold thy two brown hands in mine?"

Eminently Californian.

We wish we had space for a puff of M. J. Kelly, formerly of the Barnacle, now of the Lynchburg, Va., Republican. But we have not; though our grief for that privation is somewhat tempered by noting that the Alaska Herald has space, and has used it with intelligence and discrimination. In the Herald's opinion, Mr. Kelly is "an able and brilliant writer," "a fine scholar," "a great traveler," and all the rest of it; you know how these things run. When Mr. Kelly was here, we were prone to look upon him as a clever little fellow, with more ingenuity than talent, and a greater knack at dodging creditors than ability to conduct a newspaper. We regarded him as better versed in horses than history, and more familiar with late suppers than with literature. He is a good fellow, is Kelly, and can catalogue an oyster with unerring judgment, and sample gin like a Hollander. Harry George and the stockholders of the Sacramento Reporter retain kindly memories of his journalistic career, and have had numberless reminders of it in his lively bills presented for payment, with unfailing regularity, every Monday morning. Yes; as brother Honcharenko truly remarks: Kelly is "eminently Californian in his style and manner," but it is to be feared that, in his new field of usefulness, these peculiarities will have but a brief lease of popularity. They have to be maintained at considerable expense to Mr. Kelly's friends and employers, and the profit of them is not apparent in the long run.

— Now that the election is over, the newspapers are occupying themselves with the gentle stupidities of peace. The lying will proceed as usual, but it will no longer have a political significance. Detraction and calumny, with all their black brood, will forsake the high places and perch thickly along the pleasant waysides of private life. The former candidates for office will be permitted to sink unnoted into the cool gloom of obscurity, and the blinding beam of exposure which lately illumined their characters and brought the spots thereon into painful conspicuity, will now be turned impartially upon the rest of us. Public affairs will be given a brief season of immunity, and more attention will be accorded to our social, personal and family relations; our private peccadilloes will reassume their just relative importance.

— A youth in Iowa is dead from his neck downward—dead and gone to his account. As to head, he is a very lively and intelligent fellow. He has been that way, the papers say, for two years, and thinks it nice. He experiences but one inconvenience: he has to stand up to the chin in strong pickle to keep from decaying. We think this party ought to be taken out and buried in a post-hole, leaving the head exposed. The worms would then come by their own, and if the head should choose to carry on an independent existence on its own account, it could do so. It is undemocratic to favor a minority, and at the same time not permit a respectable body, whose function is fulfilled to peacefully disincorporate.

— Dr. Grosner, of Louisville, has been committed to prison upon a charge of killing his wife by cruel treatment. And she has probably been committed to the Bottomless Pit for provoking him beyond endurance.

A Fragment.

BY JOAQUIN MILLER.

Let the red lips lift, proud curled, to kiss,
 And round limbs lean and raise and reach
 In love too passionate for speech—
 Too full of blessedness and bliss
 For anything but this and this;
 Let luscious lips lean hot to kiss
 And swoon in love, whilst all the air
 Is redolent with balm of trees,
 And mellow with the song of bees,
 While birds sit singing everywhere;
 And you will have not any more
 Than I in boyhood, by that shore
 Of olives, had in years of yore.

She had wept and wondered at my delay,
 Alone and in tears, with her head held down,
 Where the ships sail out and the seas swirl in,
 Forgetting to knit and refusing to spin.
 She shall lift her head, she shall see her lover,
 She shall hear his voice like a sea that rushes;
 She shall hold his gold in her hands of snow,
 And down on her breast she shall hide her blushes;
 And never a care shall her true heart know,
 While the clouds are below, or the clouds are above her.

Paris in 1795.

The carriages and the fine people are all coming to light again, or rather it seems only a long dream to them, during which they ever ceased to glitter. Everything is got up in this country to amuse and make life agreeable. People tear themselves away from reflection, and how is it possible to look at the dark side of this busy vortex? Women are everywhere—in the theatres, promenades, libraries; in the closets of the learned you meet pretty women. This is the only place in the world where they deserve to hold the helm, and men are mad about them; they think of nothing else, and live by and for nothing else. A woman only needs six months of Paris life to find out what is due to her and what power she has. (Napoleon to Joseph, July 12, 1795.)—History of Napoleon I.

— Dr. Buckley, of this city, has contributed to the Medical and Surgical Journal a "crusher" against the system of obtaining medical experts to testify in our courts. The doctor writes very bitterly, and we referred his article to a trio of well known practitioners for an opinion regarding his sanity. They joined their wise heads above the printed page and read the article through in profound silence. "Insomnia!" gruntheth Dr. Trask. "Dysmenorrhœa!" croaketh Dr. Deane. "Retrocedent gout!" quacketh Dr. Lyford. And the solemn consultation is at an end.

— The famine in Persia has opened our eyes to the uses of children; they are good to eat, when the crops fail. It is disgraceful that we have never thought of this before, when railing at what we supposed the recklessness of parents. We see now that it is only a wise foresight; they rear a child as they rear a pig—to eat him when necessary. The parent of a multitudinous progeny shall hereafter have the benefit of our good opinion; nevertheless we shall pray for a speedy famine that he may rid us of a grievous plague.

— A woman in this city—would that we knew the tender creature's name—sent to Virginia City, Nevada, to obtain, and did obtain, the rope with which the Vigilance Committee of a few weeks ago constricted the thrapple of one Kirk. She declined to state what she intended doing with it; probably she has not yet made up her mind, but thinks it will be nice to have on the center table, anyhow. It is fervently to be wished that her husband may find it useful in flogging her.

— La Societe de Saint-Cecile of Bordeaux has offered a prize of a gold medal and 300f. for the best setting of a "Stabat Mater;" the work is to be written for solo voices, choros and full orchestra. Manuscripts may be sent to the Secretary at Bordeaux up to the 30th of November.

Old Characters in Modern Times.

We have the Addisonian varieties of widow, of coquette, of flirt, of prude, and their male supplements or equivalents, conducting their existences, and ordering their manners and habits and pursuits in much the same fashion as that in which the Spectator depicted them. The dancing and fiddling and other humors of Vanity Fair; the survival and success of the fittest in the struggle for social precedence; the spites and jealousies and heart-burnings generated in the hearts and brains of creatures who have no intellectual resources, and who are constantly irritated by the necessity of preserving their small consequence in their little circles; the neglected wives, the roving husbands, the fortune-hunters, the panders, the blacklegs, the usurers, the hypocrites, the high-minded gentleman, the knaves of quality and the poor rogues, the demirep and the thing she comes to, the scheming mother, the harmless eccentric, the complacent nincompoop, the man about town, the garrulous quidnunc, the entire gallery and museum of labeled social types and specimens which are open to our inspection in the pages of the Spectator, are to be seen and met with in the real world in which we live and move. Hence it is that we so often come across contemporary essays, which appear to contain such trite and familiar commonplaces.—Daily News.

— New York has just furnished a case where a man was prosecuted for carrying on business on his own premises which disturbed the services in a church near by, and now Cincinnati furnishes one of still greater general interest, where a man has been brought before the courts for carrying on a business which disturbed his neighbors and made their lives wretched, the business being the manufacture of iron material, and the nuisance consisting of the noise that the workmen make in nailing sheet iron on a smooth wooden surface. The complainant said the noise rendered life most insupportable at his house, and his neighbors testify in corroboration, adding, further, that funeral services were once prevented, and an auction sale broken up, in consequence of the fearful din, which completely drowned the voices of both clergyman and auctioneer.

— The Mongolian element has not escaped the effect of the recent political excitement. Owing to the whites being so preoccupied with their election iniquities, the Chinamen have had to do their own dirty work. They have done it with more intelligence than could have been expected: the corpses have the clean, healthy look that is given by the hand of an artist. With a little experience these ingenious people would be able to slaughter themselves and one another quite as deftly as we do it for them. But it cannot be as good fun for them as it is for us, you know.

— On Saturday last the melancholy remains of a new-born babe were found on the beach at Alameda Point. The body was but freshly dead and sweet as a pickle. The fact that its head and one arm had been unskillfully riven off with some sharp instrument, has led to suspicion of foul play, but we cannot regard the evidence as convincing. It is more probable that some fisherman innocently executed the mutilation with an idea of obtaining bait.

— It is pleasing to observe that the holders of Confederate bonds in England are able to be out and attend meetings of their kind. It appears that a committee of them appointed for that purpose are about to submit a report—which will be published. All this is extremely cheerful and inspiring—like the song of an evening Jackass in a graveyard, or the death smile of a hopeful Christian whose entrails are knotted with colic.

— At a meeting of the Academy of Sciences, on Monday evening, Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute, sought to create a soul under the ribs of capital by pointing out the manifold advantages of bequeathing money to science. We forego the pleasure of giving his remarks in full, inasmuch as they were not addressed to us, for we are not worth a dollar. The Academy is not worth a cent.

— The Coast Survey has kindly designated the position of a dangerous rock in our harbor by bearings from it to certain land-marks, one of which is a chimney and another a clump of bushes. This is, perhaps, vague; it would have been better to point out its location with reference to some object of more assured stability; for example, a log-bank, a grazing cow, or a man stealing shirts off a clothes-line.

— The annual Juvenile Festival of the Tonic Sol-fa Association will be held at on the 16th inst. The choir will comprise four thousand voices.

Harvest.

BY MARY B. DODGE.

Sun-bathed and blest in the golden weather,
 Crowned for delight or crowned for pain,
 Sheaved as ripe grain of the field together,
 Covered with love from the possible rain—
 One are the hearts that were yesterday twain.

Either has wandered a separate river,
 Half of its course through the meadows of Time;
 Here, at the junction, the floodgates deliver
 All the wealth they have gathered betime—
 Each unto each in a rhythm sublime.

Rapturous moment of full-fruited gleanings!
 Rapturous blending of spirit with kin!
 One in the heavens but knoweth the meaning
 Of tenderest mystery hidden within
 This meeting of waters, this harvested sheen.

A Second Railroad Mortgage.

The California Pacific Railroad Company, according to the Solano Republican, have given a second mortgage on that road to F. D. Atherton and Milton S. Latham in trust to secure the payments of bonds to the amount of $1,600,000. The bonds are to run twenty years and bear six per cent. interest. The purchase of the road by the Central Pacific, it is understood, extended only to a majority of the stock, which, beyond its importance as securing control of the road, could only be of nominal value, as the first mortgage bonds had covered the value. The Central Pacific take possession of the road to-day.

The Republican Victory.

The Republican majority in the recent election is estimated as high as 7,000. Comparing this with the election of 1867, the Democrats have lost some 13,000 votes. The returns, however, are yet incomplete, but sufficient has been received to surprise both parties at such an unlooked for majority. In the city the Tax-payers have had a wonderful success. With all the favor with which this party was looked upon in the city, the carrying the whole ticket nearly was more than their most sanguine friends anticipated.

The Fall Trade.—The prospects for an early and brisk fall trade are improving. The crops in all sections of the country are large, and, though the prices of agricultural produce are low, the farmers are likely to get and to spend more money this year than last. The hotels in New York are already beginning to fill up with merchants from the South and West.

— A witty and pleasant friend addresses to us a communication in pleasant rhyme, as the "Right Rev. Aerial Bishop of San Francisco." In 1872 all the Bishops and their woolly flocks will have to think—as they have never yet done. The Avitor may be slow, and may sleep, but prenez garde!—It is nearer than dwellers dream of.

From Europe to Chicago via Montreal.—The Chicago Tribune calls attention to a new phase of the Chicago importing trade which has been recently developed. This is in bringing goods from Europe through Montreal and landing them directly at the wharfs without previous overhauling. Several merchants have adopted this channel of traffic, which promises to grow rapidly by reason of its success.

— It is said that Prince Charles, of Roumania, does not occupy himself with public affairs. This is equitable: public affairs do not occupy themselves with Prince Charles, of Roumania.

— The women and girls have taken to wearing stockings of bright crimson and scarlet. Blue and yellow are still fashionable among the other hens and pullets.

— Texas has a new game in cards—one holds a revolver, the other holds the cards. A coroner holds the inquest.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

[Report for the Week ending September 16th, 1871.]

— The imports of Tea from January 1st to September 14th have been, from China 535,104 pounds, and from Japan 1,615,527 pounds. Regarding the increasing importation of Teas for Eastern consumption, by way of San Francisco, the Commercial Herald and Market Review makes the following logical answer to parts of an article in the New York Grocer, which latter fights valiantly the article in favor of direct importation by sea to New York, and contends that all importations via San Francisco must involve a loss to importers: "Again, if the importation of these Teas had proved a losing transaction, the orders to forward them without delay would not have been so urgent and peremptory. The Grocer alleges that 'the large shipments of Teas by steamers are mostly by new houses in the trade throughout the country, and by young houses here [New York], who have ordered without limits.' Now, the fact is, that the Teas alluded to have been mainly bought and placed in market by A. A. Low & Co., of New York; Brown, Brothers & Co., New York, and Olyphant & Co., of China, New York and San Francisco. Are these new or young houses? The Grocer has evidently been misled by one of its Shanghai correspondents, who says, among other things of like character, 'These large orders have not been sent by the large and old houses in the trade, but by the younger houses continually springing up here, having no experience and less capital.' We can scarcely conceive the minimum of capital which is less than 'no experience,' but would like to inquire how it is, that people of no capital managed to buy and ship new-crop teas, up to the 4th of August, to the extent of 57,000,000 pounds, from the Chinese market? They must, certainly, have been very clever operators. The Grocer estimates that 'each steamer can probably bring as large a cargo as the Japan—about 800 tons—and the four steamers engaged may land in San Francisco, say 3,200 tons.' Only three steamers—the Japan, China and Alaska—have already landed over 7,500 tons, and will land as much more in the next two months; and this large quantity will be further increased by the cargoes of the bark Hammonia and other vessels, besides that of the extra steamer Arizona. The importations through San Francisco will probably reach 25,000 tons before the season closes, and that is quite as much as the whole country consumes annually. The greater portion of this will be placed in market before those shipped by sail can possibly arrive at New York. Our contemporary exultingly remarks, 'If San Francisco is such a great center for the Tea trade, why has it found it necessary to establish agencies in Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, to work off its surplus stock, small as it is?' What business has a growing tree to send forth branches? Why can it not remain little better than a stick? What right has San Francisco to extend her trade into markets once monopolized by New York? What a wonderful proof we have given of the incompetency and languishing business of our merchants! What audacity have they not evinced in thus treading on the corns of their New York competitors! There is one point in which we wholly agree with the Grocer: 'There is no use trying to force trade out of its proper channels; and the Tea-merchants of the whole country are fast finding out that the proper channel is San Francisco.'

— The Blue Book publishes the imports and exports of Great Britain for the year as follows: Imports, $1,663,758,750; exports, $1,315,272,140. These returns are higher than has ever been known, but they show a balance of trade against Great Britain of $348,486,610. The imports exceeding the exports to so great an amount is especially worthy of notice in view of the fact that Great Britain is essentially a manufacturing and commercial nation, exporting the results of its mechanical skill, and importing by far the major portion of the people's food. It will be noticed in these returns, that the imports exceed the exports by about $350,000,000; or in other words, that this large amount of money goes yearly out of the country, principally for food, in excess of that which comes in to pay for it. To meet this balance of trade, however, there are the returns upon British capital invested abroad, and were it not for these, the finances of the country would be in anything but a prosperous condition. The United States is by far England's best customer, and the exports to us for 1870 were 15 per cent. increase upon 1869, and they are returned as valued at $141,676,970—the largest amount of any year except 1866, which showed the highest of any in the commercial dealings between the two countries. This is accounted for by the fact that the war over, the people returning to their ordinary occupations, become increased consumers, and the home industries had not then had sufficient time to get in active operation. The products on which there was an increase last year are returned as follows: Railroad iron, $6,000,000; cotton piece goods, $1,100,000; haberdashery, $970,000; woolens, $900,000; worsteds, $850,000; and unenumerated articles, $7,600,000. If we are the best customers to Great Britain, they reciprocate the compliment, and are decidedly the most liberal patronizers of American produce. In 1870 Great Britain imported from the United States products to the value of $246,973,775, being an increase of over $36,000,000 on the former year. This large increase is probably owing to raw cotton, the value of that product for the year footing up to no less than $156,726,440. Despite the fact that some interested parties have been trying to turn the raw cotton trade into another channel, it will be interesting to Americans to know that while the exports from America have, since the war, been yearly increasing, there has been a falling off in those countries from whence the British manufacturers were in future to draw their supply. Thus Egypt last year decreased $11,000,000, while America increased $36,000,000. This is encouraging, and assures those engaged in cotton culture that they need have no fear of obtaining a market for their produce. These returns also have a satisfactory showing in comparing the advantages of the trade between the two peoples, as Great Britain laid out $107,196,865 more than the United States bought from Great Britain.

— The correspondent of the Commercial Herald, at Honolulu, writes under date August 28th: We look upon July, August and September as our dull months of the year, and we can truly say this season, so far, has formed no exception. Our market is overstocked with many articles, such as flour, bread, salmon, beef, pork and liquors. We have had more than the usual number of arrivals during the month, several of which have been with coals from Newcastle and Victoria, chiefly on Steamship Company's account. Two cargoes have, however, been sold at $10. Our market is quite bare of sugar and molasses, and shipments will be light for the next two months. The coming crop promises to be large, and, from appearances, will be earlier in the market than usual.

Brevities.

— On the 7th instant a large blast of gunpowder was fired at the Mountsorrel Quarries, attended with very remarkable results. The cliff, which may be seen from the Midland Railway between Barrow and Leicester, standing boldly up 100 feet in height, and many hundreds of yards in length, was pierced about 40 feet from the ground by a deep bore hole, and 450 pounds of powder secured therein. When the blast was fired the whole face of the rock came away together with scarcely any other sound than the crushing of the rock in its fall. The quantity thrown down is estimated at 20,000 tons, and is by far the largest weight of stone ever before moved by one blast at these granite quarries.

— The cultivation of cotton in the United States commenced with this century, and it rose from 400,000 bales in 1820, to 5,000,000 in 1859 and 1861, the two most productive years. The price fell during the same period from 50 cents to 10 cents a pound. Since the end of the civil war, cotton cultivation has rapidly increased, and it is estimated that the quantity gathered during the past season will reach 4,000,000 bales, an amount which has only been surpassed in 1859 and 1861. But the war between France and Germany has influenced the price in a most disastrous manner, and cotton which a year ago sold for 25 cents a pound, now obtains only 15 cents.

— A woman named Parsons, from Thetford, was found at Cambridge in the up-mail train, on August 14th, without a ticket. The inspector allowed her to proceed on her journey, but said he should telegraph to London, which he did. On the arrival of the train, however, no such woman as described was there. She was afterwards found on the line near Cambridge, with her feet frightfully mutilated. An infant she had with her was uninjured. In her nervous terror at what the result of the telegraph might be she had thrown herself and child from the carriage.

— It is pointed out by the Italian journals that the great tunnel under Mount Cenis, which it is said was to be opened on September 15th, has been completed three months before the time stipulated in the contract, viz., December 1871. The works were commenced in 1857, and have thus been fourteen years in hand. The rate of progress has been about three yards per day. On the French side there is still part of the connecting line—about six miles in length—incomplete. This will not be ready until a month after the opening of the tunnel.

— Mr. Ralph Montague Bernard, the senior surgeon of the Bristol, England, Royal Infirmary, was accidentally killed on August 11th by falling from the cliffs at Gwbert, in the Bay of Cardigan, on to the beach, a depth of seventy feet. The deceased gentleman was walking with his wife along the cliffs, when the edge gave way and allowed him to fall. He sustained a severe fracture of the skull, and died in a few minutes.

— Mr. A. J. Cassatt, the general superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad, has reported upon engine No. 422, which has been taken into shop for repairs, that she was placed upon the road October 17, 1871. During the whole of this time she hauled fast and heavy trains over the middle division, and she ran 153,280 miles, her repairs costing a little less than 2½ cents per mile.

— The commandant of the port of Nicolaieff, Vice-Admiral Arkass, is making himself fully acquainted with every detail of the port. The Russian authorities are also credited with an intention to make a geographical, or rather a hydrographical survey of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azoff, including the soundings, the temperature of the water, the best anchorages, etc.

— The Glasgow Star says that the Rev. Robert Thompson is going to preach two sermons, believed on good authority to have been composed by Sir Walter Scott, at Abbotsford, in 1828, for a young clerical friend of his own. The sermons are very scarce, being almost out of print.

— Rich argentiferous lead is stated to have been discovered at Aspen, on the Union Pacific Railroad. Claims have been taken, and a company with a capital of $75,000 have been formed to work them.

Work People and Wages

I like to see the Working Man
Pursue his upward way,
For still, deny it if you can,
"To labor is to pray."
I like to see him lay, or shape
The brick, wield saw or plane,
Or ply the glazier's blade, and scrape
His putty off the pane.
When up and down, and to and fro,
I view him sweep the brush,
When deftly "job" the paint on, O!
With sympathy I gush.
When he, with swivel-gimlet, drills
A hole, his leveled eye
I mark, until mine own so fills,
That I could almost cry.

But not a Working Man alone
Is he who wage receives
For work in flannel jacket done,
Or done in his shirt-sleeves.
In Parliament both 'Squire and Peer
Are Working Men; all they
Who do the work: their toil's severe:
They work both night and day.
A Working Man the Judge I call,
In wig, for paper cap;
The Bishop ev'n, though not with awl
To apron on his lap:
A sight, when on his work intent,
Of quite as noble kind
As Odger would himself present,
His business would be mind.

The highest person in the State,
A Working Woman too,
Works always early, often late,
And harder far than you
To whose expense the Sovereign adds.
Nought you can feel, ye sour
Small set of disaffected Cads,
Who grudge her Children's dower.

A Climatic Rhapsody.

Dear Eastern Visitor, heard you ever of "our climate?" It is probable that since doubling down over the sharp Sierra you have heard of little else. You have doubtless been exasperated with a great exasperation, hearing of, and feeling not. You have come to regard "our climate" as a golden dream—a delicious and inspiring phantom of the imagination—"a radiant and adored deceit." You have been fain to look upon us as deluded visionaries if not ornate liars. Now you see how it is! Have not the last few days been innocent of biting blasts, and guileless of gushing sand sweeps! Have not the nights appertaining unto these days been free of marching fogs and searching chill? Has not Consumption furled her banner, and Asthma loosed his grip upon the constricted vitals. This, O Eastern Visitor, this is "our climate!" Is it not rare, and fine, and luscious? Is it not sweet with health, and laden heavily with life? "Languor!" Aye! the languor that is simply vitality militant crowned with repose triumphant; the languor that comes of having nothing to wish for. It is the languor of a soul that gives itself up to tranquility, as a sun-crowned Island surrenders himself to the sleeping Sea, with the feel of her waves lapping dreamily against his sides, and the drone of her music in the ear of his drowsiness! Where now, Æolus, are thy gusty gibes that were wont to set thee in a roar? Where are thy puffs of dust that make one involuntarily shelter himself behind the passing cart-horse, and expect to see that honest creature kneel, camel-like, till the desert sand-storm shall have spent itself against the Pyramids? Look to the west'ard there, at Bernal Heights, over whose broad back you have been accustomed to see Evening pull a shirt of fog and button it with a star. Lone Mountain lifts his cross against an opal sky, clear and stainless as the eye of beauty, and fathomless as love! Of all the many dead out there no ghost shall sneak and gibber to-night, for he shall not gather mist enough to sheet him decently from public observation. Aye, good Eastern Visitor, we have caught you in our climate at last, and shall make the most of you. For to-morrow it will blow great guns, the next day you shall not open your eyes for pelting gravel, and the next you shall see nothing if you do, for the fog will be thick enough to cut with a cheese-knife. Then, for three hundred and sixty-two days, racking rheumatisms, distracting neuralgias and the crazing exasperation of catarrh! "Our climate" is a goodly climate, and a wholesome, but, like Christmas, it "comes but once a year."

— The members of the New Jerusalem Church, on O'Farrell street, have presented their pastor, Johannes Doughty, with a purse of one hundred dollars. We hold the copyright of a very pleasing poem, beginning, "Didymus Dumkleton Doughty Don John," which we will dispose of for one-half the sum. It appeared once in this journal, and was generally regarded as a very pretty piece of versification. If the copyright were once disposed of we should have no right to re-publish it without the consent of the owner. We are chaffing you, Johnny; we couldn't lay our hands upon that poem to save our precious life—unless, indeed, you would give us access to your own private papers, where we have no doubt it is secretly but sacredly preserved. Well, well, this is a wicked, wicked word—a very dog of a world, egad! Happy is the man who gets through it with unbitten shins.

— There is great sickness in Boston.—Exchange. [True, Boston is sick of her inhabitants.

Great Britain and the United States.

In a speech delivered at Whitby recently, Gladstone made use of certain expressions which were deemed of sufficient importance to be transmitted across three thousand miles of ocean by telegraph. The words have been commented upon, and we are glad to see favorably, by most of the daily papers here. What were the words? They were these: "We can now look upon Americans as friends. * * * We may now indulge the hope that all controversies between the two peoples are settled." Mr. Gladstone was speaking of the good effects of the Washington Treaty; and it is our opinion that most of our readers will agree with us when we say that, looking at the improved relations of the two peoples, and remembering that these improved relations are the fruit of the Washington Treaty, the Premier was fully justified in using this encouraging and hopeful language. Americans and Britons are brethren sprung from the same stock; they speak the same language; they have inherited the same traditions; they are proud of a common history; they are happy under similar institutions; why should they not be friends? In the great and growing future, it will be the interest of the two nations to go hand in hand. They represent the race which stands at the head of civilization. United and working together in harmony, they may maintain their place. Disunited, they are in danger of being outrun and left behind. For the first time in many centuries the Anglo-Saxon race has a powerful rival. The Germans are close at our heels. Disunion made the Germans weak. Union has made the German strong. Union is all that is required to maintain the Anglo-Saxon in his proud position, and ultimately to give him the world for his possession. The entente cordiale now apparently established between the two peoples will not, we trust, be soon disturbed.

Australasian Steamships.

According to the New Zealand papers, the average passages of the Hall line of steamers, between Sydney and San Francisco, have been 38 days. The average of six passages of the Webb line, from San Francisco to Auckland, has been under 33 days. If to this be added four and a half days from Auckland to Sydney, it gives 37½ days from San Francisco to the latter port. But it is to be observed that on two occasions the time has been less by two days, and on one occasion less by three, which would make the time only 34½ days. Considering that the detour by way of New Zealand increases the distance by some hundreds of miles, Mr. Webb's line is decidedly ahead of its competitor, having made better running by something like 40 miles per day. We observe by the Melbourne papers that Mr. Webb had an interview with the Government of Victoria with reference to a subsidy for his uncle's line of steamers. Mr. Duffy said that he must consult Parliament in the matter, and it would probably stipulate that Melbourne should be the terminus for the steamers. There is no doubt that this line is growing in favor with the Australians, but the breaks in the voyage at Honolulu, and again at Auckland, are great drawbacks to securing subsidies from the Victoria, New South Wales, or Queensland Governments. The subject of more frequent and rapid communication between Australia and England has lately been discussed in the latter country, and the British Postmaster General states that the line of steamers with which the New Zealand Government has lately made a contract (the Webb line) offers a good opportunity of an alternative fortnightly service, regarding which the opinion of the colonists themselves is desirable.

Walter Montgomery.

We have been favored by Mr. Lyster, Business Manager of the California Theater, with a copy of the London Drawing-room Gazette, containing a notice of the last appearance, in Hamlet, of poor Walter Montgomery. The newspaper was addressed to Mr. Lyster in the great tragedian's own handwriting. The critique, which is quite too lengthy for our columns, shows conclusively that professional mortification could have had no hand in provoking the mental aberration which led to the act by which he "rashly importunate gone to his death" has left a vacancy not easily to be filled up. In concluding the notice, the Gazette says: "We pronounce 'Hamlet' his greatest success. 'Louis XI.' was a wonderful impersonation, but his 'Hamlet' is indeed infinitely pathetic and poetical, manly, tender and luminous—for the soul and heart of the stricken Dane are felt throughout above the questions of philosophy. The scene with 'Ophelia' is a masterpiece of acting. It is so charged with feeling as to become to those who hear it a memory forever. Mr. Montgomery's 'Hamlet' shows deep æsthetic study—far deeper than the old interpretation, as we have endeavored to indicate by the newer light of his delineation." Mr. Montgomery's success before a London audience of the most critical stamp, stands out in strong contrast to the grudging, peevish tone of some of the soi-disant critics of this hard-to-please city. Poor Walter, alas! forgetful that "the Almighty has set his canon 'gainst self-slaughter" has gone, but his genial memory will live with his friends and those of the public capable of appreciating true genius and simplicity of heart.

— Gen. Crook has received no orders to discontinue hostilities against the Apaches. Just wait till he kills one.

I and Thou.

[FROM THE GERMAN OF GEIBEL.]

I am a rose that, in the field,
Breathes to the breeze perfume—
O, love, thou art the cooling dew
That wakes me into bloom.

I am the jewel, darkly hid,
In gloomy mines below—
Thou art the sunbeam in whose light
My varied colors glow.

I am the crystal goblet, whence
A monarch drinks his wine—
Thou art the sweet, unpurpled wave
Whose splendors through me shine.

I am the gloomy thunder-cloud
That sweeps across the skies—
Thou art the shining rainbow, love!
That on my bosom lies.

I am the Memnon, dumb and dead,
The desert sands among—
Thou art the crimson light of day,
That wakes my heart to song.

I am an erring man that gropes
Amid bewild'ring night—
Thou art an angel, sent from God,
To lead me to the light.

Week of Prayer Throughout the World.

A circular has just been issued by the Evangelical Alliance, calling upon Christians of all nations throughout the world, to make arrangements for setting apart the week commencing January 7, 1872, for special humiliation, thanksgiving and prayer. In the course of an address upon the subject of universal prayer, the circular says: "Christians throughout the world have been accustomed for many years past, and with increasing encouragement and advantage, to consecrate the week, commencing with the first Sunday in January, to united supplication. Day by day in that week they have been brought into sympathy with each other's wants, and duties, and trials, with each other's union in Christ, with each other's privileges, and with each other's participation in Divine and eternal realities." The circular, after suggesting suitable topics for exhortation and prayer upon the successive days of meeting, touches upon the necessity of united prayer, especially for heathen lands, and cites the astounding fact, that while 500,000,000 of the entire population of the world consists of Protestants, Roman Catholics, Greeks, Jews, and Mahomedans, the other 788,000,000 are entirely pagan. The circular bears the signatures of the Earl of Chichester and James Davis, and Hermann Schmetsman, Ph.D., as President and Secretaries of the British branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and is also signed by the Presidents and Secretaries of the American, French, German, Belgian, Dutch, Netherlands, Swedish, Turkish and Greek branches of the Alliance.

Communist Prisoners.

The trial of the Communist prisoners at Versailles continues to excite much attention in Paris. General Chanzy, in giving evidence, stated that when arrested by the Communists, and taken before the Central Committee, a fair-haired young man apologized for the arrest, and afterwards set him at liberty. He was not quite positive, but believed this fair-haired young man to be the prisoner Billioray. In contradiction of a statement of Assi, who had asserted that during the time of the Commune he manufactured none but ordinary munitions of war, witnesses were called who had heard that poison was introduced into the shells. Assi, however, denied all knowledge of this, and said that many other persons besides himself gave orders. Jourde, the Finance Minister of the Commune, was then examined, and it was stated by the Provisional Governor of the Bank of France that he had extracted in all from that establishment sixteen millions of francs. Witnesses have been called to prove that the Ministry of Finance was set on fire not by the Communists, but by shells from the Versailles artillery. A woman, a concierge at the Ministry of Finance, stated that during the conflagrations in Paris she saw men, dressed like firemen, throwing upon the flames some liquid which only increased their intensity. Courbet, the painter, takes credit to himself for having saved many priceless works of art, and denies that he voted for the destruction of the Vendome Column.

Cars for Sacramento.

The Kimball Manufacturing Company, have shipped two more handsome street cars for the Sacramento City Railroad Company, making ten for the same corporation. The cars of the Kimball Manufacturing Company are becoming immensely popular, and our local railroad companies are learning that they can get as good an article, or better, at home, at a cost of $100 less per car than the imported. This Company also, last steamer, shipped two cars, the first installment, for a street railroad in Yokohama. They are also building a train of very handsome passenger coaches for the Southern Pacific—thus inaugurating a branch of industry that is bound to grow and become an important feature of our home manufactures. Our splendid material gives California a great advantage over the East for car building, and we prophesy a large and profitable business for the Kimball Company, they having shown by actual demonstration that they can successfully compete with the East. Their palace car was pronounced the finest specimen of workmanship and ornamental woods ever seen in that section.

The London General Post Office.

To give some idea of the magnitude of the operations in which the General Post Office is concerned, the Postmaster-General observes in his report just issued that in London alone during the past year about 10,565,000 yards of string were used for tying up the letters for the country, and about 17,637 lbs. of sealing wax for securing the bags in which the letters were contained, the bags in use being about 700,000 in number. In England and Wales, the quantity of ink supplied for impressing postmarks on letters and for obliterating postage stamps was about four tons, and the number of forms employed, exclusive of anything in the nature of a book, amounted to 20,692,000. It is unpleasant to draw invidious distinctions between public departments (says a contemporary), but when the Postmaster-General boasts of the number of yards of string consumed in his establishment during the twelve months, it is only fair to point out that the quantity of red tape made use of at the War Office during the same period probably far exceeds that of the Post Office string. There are other departments we could mention whose exertions in tying up documents are beyond all praise.

A New Oracle.

A new oracle is to speak in Rome. Father Tiber, who has so often been apostrophized, is to have his turn, and to unfold that tale upon which archæologists have been harping for centuries. The political emancipation of Rome is the signal, and a flutter of expectancy agitates the savants and antiquarians of the world. The Italians have resolved that the bed of their river shall be excavated. A company has been formed—we can do nothing individually or nationally, it must be by a company—to carry out the work, and to restore all of monumental interest that has been embalmed in its mud. From end to end, from Ripetta to Ripa Grande, the river is to be dredged. Warriors' arms and accoutrements of five centuries before Christ, gems, coins, precious vessels, statues—types of the wealth of generations—flung into the ancient stream in times of panic and convulsion, are expected to reward the efforts of the enterprise. What memories will be revived! and what a scramble will there be for possession of the Tiber treasures!—Overland Mail.

Fiji.

As neither England nor America will undertake the government of Fiji, and as its annexation to Victoria or New South Wales would be illegal, Cacaban, the most powerful of the native chiefs, has assumed the title of King, and entered to rule as a constitutional monarch. He has formed a Ministry, and a Constitution has been promulgated which provides for the establishment of civil and religious liberty, cheap and simple administration of justice and the enjoyment of equal rights. The attention of the government will be at once directed to the foundation of a bank of deposit and issue, guaranteed by the Crown, the federation of the various chiefdoms, the recognition of Fiji as one of the powers of the earth by those foreign governments with whom his Majesty has not hitherto had intercourse. The Government of the Sandwich Island has announced its intention to recognize the government of King Cacaban.—Nelson, N. Z., Examiner.

— A physician in Kansas is entitled to honorable mention for personal cleanliness. The other evening he took a razor and made an excavation into the neck of his little girl. He then treated his wife in the same way. These died. Our hero then obtained a large pan, set it on the floor, lay down with his head in it and sawed assunder all that he could get at in his own neck. The pan caught all the blood, and both the floor and the doctor's raiment were unsullied. The body is said to have had the clean transparency of very young veal, but the head having lopped down into the pan was considerably gummed up. We recommend in all similar cases the use of a small rack to sustain the pate when its guys and stays have been cut away.

— A fellow in Albany flung his sweetheart off a balcony and broke her leg in three places. He was arrested for the deed, but she declined to appear against him. There is some comfort in having a girl like that. Your ordinary, heartless and brainless maiden, whom it is dangerous to even kick, and who for every handful of hair you pull out of her scalp will make you suffer a week's vexation, is a weariness to the flesh and a heaviness to the spirit. Shun her, dear reader, even as you would shun a creditor. Close your eyes to her charms, as you close them to the contribution plate at church. Shut your ears to her appeals, as you do to those of a sick beggar. Have no more to do with her than if she were a needy relative.

— Since election, many Republicans have appeared in bran new suits. Comment is unnecessary.—Bulletin. [You might have explained that there have been several fires.]

The Hindoo Sceptic.

I think till I weary with thinking,
Said the sad-eyed Hindoo king,
And I see but shadows around me—
Illusion in everything.

How knowest thou aught of God,
Of His favor or His wrath?

Can the little fish tell what the lion thinks,
Or map out the eagle's path?

Can the finite the infinite search?

Did the blind discover the stars?

Is the thought that I think a thought,
Or a throb of the brain in its bars?

For ought that my eye can discern,
Your God is what you think good,
Yourself flashed back from the glass,
When the light pours on it in flood.

When the fish swims out of the water,

When the birds soar out of the blue,

Man's thought may transcend man's knowledge,

And your God be no reflex of you.

You preach to me to be just;

And this is His realm you say,

And the good are dying of hunger,

And the bad gorge every day.

You say that He loveth mercy,

And the famine is not yet gone;

That He hateth the shedder of blood,

And He slayeth us every one.

You say that my soul shall live,

That the spirit can never die—

If He were content when I was not,

Why not when I have passed by?

You say I must have a meaning,

So must dung, and its meaning is flowers.

What if our souls are but nurture

For lives that are greater than ours.

The Cholera.

During the past week we have received several reports by mail and by cable of the ravages of the cholera in Asia and Europe and of its approach towards America. In Persia it is prevailing, and with its allies in the work of destruction—famine, fevers, small-pox and the cattle plague—is reducing portions of the country to an uninhabited desert. The famine in the southern provinces appears to be worse than was first reported. In Khorassan one-third of the whole population is said to have perished from it. At Ispahan twenty-seven thousand have died of hunger. In many quarters the drouth has caused a total failure of the rice crop; and in some districts, the greater part of the oxen and buffaloes are said to have died, and substitutes in the way of food have been sought in vain. In Europe the cholera appears to be most destructive in the cities of Western Russia and Eastern Prussia. Cases have occurred as far west as Hamburg. The probability of the epidemic being carried on board of vessels from Baltic ports is so strong that precautions against its entrance have been taken at all the chief ports of Great Britain. By mail we learn that one case of cholera has occurred in Greenock, and the most vigorous measures are being taken to prevent an outbreak of the epidemic. The Sanitary Committee have agreed to appoint Dr. Wallace consulting physician to the sanitary inspection. Dr. McDougal has been appointed to board all vessels arriving at the Tail of the Bank, where there is reason to suspect any member of the crew being ill of the plague. The committee have also agreed to recommend that the present reception house in Gleebe be converted into a cholera hospital; and that a temporary iron hospital, similar to those in use in London and elsewhere, be procured and erected in Garvel Park grounds. The police are further instructed to commence a house-to-house visitation, and distribute valuable printed information among the inhabitants, who are requested to give prompt information to the authorities of any case occurring in a family. At other ports of Scotland and England similar measures have been adopted, and it is hoped that the epidemic may be arrested in its westward progress. At present it has not obtained a firm footing on any part of the Three Kingdoms, and there is little probability of its cutting off many victims there until next year—when it may be terrible. Meanwhile the best precautions against its appearance on this side of the Atlantic are the practice of temperance and cleanliness, the suppression of cesspools and the expenditure of pure water.

— Mr. Priddy and his female returned home, drawn by a pair of horses. (Mr. P. and his f. had been driving for their health.) Straightway appeared upon the scene ten white-headed Priddies, of assorted sizes, screaming like infuriated hounds, leaping like maniacs, and gesticulating like a tempest of wind-mills. A nice way to welcome these staid and respectable parties! The horses turned aside in disgust, sprang deliberately off a bank, sank breathless through the yielding air, stopped when they got to the bottom, and Madame Priddy was a melancholy remain. MORAL: If people will have children—bah! of course they will; what's the use of talking!

— Here is an unimportant but interesting part of the description of a Turkish beauty who is sojourning in New York—temporarily it is to be hoped: "She has the eyes of a houri, almond-shaped, deep and dreamy, and brilliant, white teeth that laugh as she laughs." Sweet Venus, what a nice girl! It would be worth a thousand years of one's life to own her. What delight to see one's own face mirrored in those eyes! What bliss to minister to her wants! For example, to insert slices of bacon between those laughing teeth.

A Remarkable Ghost Story.

Lord Brougham, in his recently published autobiography, gives an account of a trip he made to Norway, and relates how, on a cold day in Norway, he arrived at an hotel which had the unusual luxury of a bath-room. He says: "Tired with the cold of yesterday, I was glad to take advantage of a hot bath before I turned in. And here a most remarkable thing happened to me—so remarkable that I must tell the story from the beginning. After I left the high school I went with G—, my most intimate friend, to attend the classes in the university. There was no divinity class, but we frequently, in our walks, discussed and speculated upon many grave subjects, among others, on the immortality of the soul, and on a future state. This question, and the possibility, I will not say of ghosts walking, but of the dead appearing to the living, were subjects of much speculation; and we actually committed the folly of drawing up an agreement, written with our blood, that whichever of us died the first should appear to the other, and thus solve any doubts we had entertained of the 'life after death.' After we had finished our classes at the college, G— went to India, having got an appointment there in the civil service. He seldom wrote to me, and after the lapse of a few years I had almost forgotten him; moreover, his family having little connection with Edinburgh, I seldom saw or heard anything of them, or of him through them, so that all the old school-boy intimacy had died out, and I had nearly forgotten his existence. I had taken, as I have said, a warm bath; and while lying in it and enjoying the comfort of the heat after the late freezing I had undergone, I turned my head around, looking toward the chair on which I had deposited my clothes, as I was about to get up out of the bath. On the chair sat G—, looking calmly at me! How I got out of the bath I know not, but on recovering my senses I found myself sprawling on the floor. The apparition, or whatever it was that had taken the likeness of G—, had disappeared. This vision produced such a shock, that I had no inclination to talk about it, or to speak about it, even to Stuart; but the impression it made upon me was too vivid to be easily forgotten, and so strongly was I affected by it that I have here written down the whole history, with the date, 19th December, and all the particulars as they are now fresh before me. No doubt I had fallen asleep; and that the appearance presented so distinctly to my eyes was a dream, I cannot for a moment doubt; yet for years I had had no communication with G—, nor had there been anything to recall him to my recollection; nothing had taken place during our Swedish travels either connected with G—, or with India, or with anything relating to him, or to any member of his family. I recollected quickly enough our old discussion and the bargain we had made. I could not discharge from my mind the impression that G— must have died, and that his appearance to me was to be received by me as a proof of a future state; yet all the while I felt convinced that the whole was a dream; and so painfully vivid and so unfading was the impression, that I could not bring myself to talk of it or to make the slightest allusion to it. I finished dressing, and as we had agreed to make an early start, I was ready by six o'clock, the hour of our early breakfast.

"BROUGHAM, October 16th, 1862.—I have just been copying out from my journal the account of this strange dream: Certissima mortis imago! And now, to finish the story, begun about sixty years since: Soon after my return to Edinburgh there arrived a letter from India, announcing G—'s death, and stating that he had died on the 19th of December."

— At the city of Horse Prairie (we suppose it is a city) in Illinois, a child, while sleeping peaceably with its parents, was so operated upon by the teeth of rats that it has died. Parents may take a hint from this how to manage these predatory rodents. Smear the youngest pledge of affection with bane, and expose it in some rat-haunted cellar. In cases where traps are used, impaled baby might advantageously supersede toasted cheese, for bait. We had not thought that these vermin—the rats—had such degraded tastes.

— A coroner's jury in the East has found that a President and Directors of a railroad are responsible for an accident. If these doomed and guilty unfortunates shall attempt to fly from the wrath of the law, we shall esteem it a holy duty to apprise the public. If they have any manliness they will remain and suffer the consequences of their crime—the swift and terrible retribution of an offended press!

Rich Quartz.—Returns from the Thames Gold Fields, New Zealand, July 11th to August 8th, show that 6,420 tons of quartz were crushed from 60 different mines, which produced a yield of 27,520 oz. of gold. The largest yield was from the Caledonia—19,328 oz. of melted gold obtained from 1,200 tons, or nearly $290 per ton.

— "Gentlemen of the jury," said a blundering counsel, in a suit about a lot of hogs, "there were thirty-six hogs in that drove. Please to remember that fact—thirty-six hogs; just three times as many as in that jury box, gentlemen." The counsel didn't gain his case.

Henry IV. and His Misfortunes in Wales.

Henry made one or two attempts to beard Glyndwr in his mountain den, but the Welsh climate was too much for English effeminacy. The march of Henry IV. into Wales, in 1402, was a caution to Welsh tourists not to forget their umbrellas. Pennant says: "The event of his invasion was very unfortunate. Glyndwr, who had too much prudence to hazard a battle against so superior an enemy, returned to the fastnesses of the mountains, and drove away the cattle and destroyed every means the English had of subsistence. The season proved uncommonly bad, for the very elements seemed to have warred against them. A continued course of storms and rain, with the continual watching an enemy ever hovering over them, and ready to take every occasion of falling on them from the heights, wasted the army with sickness and fatigue, and obliged the living once more to make an inglorious retreat." The "Spirits from the vasty deep," that Shakspeare makes the Welsh chieftain boast he can invoke, seemed this time to come when he "did call for them," and a serious chapter might be written of Henry's misfortunes. We will give a comic one. The following is an extract from the one referred to. After recounting the journey from Shrewsbury to the mountains, the writer says:

But alack and alas! a change sad and extreme
Came over the spirit, too soon, of their dream.
One unlucky Friday (with sorrow and pain
I proceed to record it) it came on to rain!
It rained on the Saturday, it rained on the Sunday,
It rained every hour of the day on the Monday;
On Tuesday it rained cats and dogs, as they say,
And Wednesday was also a very wet day.
On Thursday and Friday, especially the latter day,
It rained very hard; but, my gracious, on Saturday
The rain was most dreadful—a great deal more bad
Than that of the very worst monarch we've had!
And King Henry's hot thirst for destruction and slaughter
Was quenched by this timely supply of cold water;
And his gallants so gay, and his barons so bold,
They couldn't catch Glyndwr—they only caught cold.
The soldiers, with rain-water up to their knees,
Were very uneasy while "standing at ease;"
And the trumpets grew hoarse, and would not sound their notes,
And the fife seemed all suffering from very sore throats.
The cavalry's brilliant equipments were spoiled,
And the horses all smoked, just as if they'd been boiled.
And the Scotch Fusiliers, with the captain thereof,
Were extremely annoyed with a very bad cough;
And nothing was seen 'mid the Yeomanry bands
But blowing of noses and wringing of hands;
And nothing was heard of the Shropshire Militia,
Night or day but—attisha! attisha!! ATTISHA!!!
And a still more tremendous misfortune befell
(Dreadful to hear, and dreadful to tell)—
King Henry himself became rather unwell!

— News has recently been received here of the death of George Aiken, Esq., who will be well remembered by old Californians as Her Britannic Majesty's Consul at this port from 1850 to 1856. Mr. Aiken died at Napier, Hawkes' Bay, New Zealand, about three months since, where he had been residing for many years. No one of the early residents of this State was more popular than George Aiken, and the report of his death will be read by many with heartfelt regret.

— It is said that strong, neat and serviceable suits of paper clothing are now made in England, at a cost of eighteen shillings. If this is true, it will prove a Godsend to our own poor: our Government will impose an import duty of only about five hundred per cent. ad valorem, for the protection of home industry, and the working classes will soon look very fine in their jaunty papyrus toggery.

— Some son of a soap-sharp, who edits a paper in the cow counties, is very much troubled in mind at the preparations for the reception of the Grand Duke Alexis, which in his opinion are "disgusting." If His Highness shall decide to come to California we hazzard little in saying that this unpleasantly affected yokel will break his neck to get a good square look at him. At least we hope he will.

Tom, the Duke of Edinburgh's Elephant.

Tom knew the pipes for meals on board the Galatea as well as any of the crew, and immediately evening quarters were over would march to the fore-castle for a "sky-lark." There he was hailed with delight, pampered with biscuit, pea-soup, and tobacco; of the latter he was very fond, and when the men were forbidden to give him this luxury because it disagreed with him, it was most curious to watch him hunting the decks, turning over the coils of ropes, pushing his trunk into every hole and corner in search of a stray quid. He was by no means particular in his diet, hay, corn, grass, wood shavings, rice, paper, straw, etc., in fact, thoroughly omnivorous; even a cake of blacking or tea-leaves did not come amiss. In his drinking he was not a whit more delicate or particular; champagne, beer, whisky, rum (of which he had a daily allowance), brandy, gin, wine and soda, all were packed away in his trunk without his appearing a bit the "worse for liquor." He never got intoxicated, although I fear some efforts have been made in that direction. At Auckland, Tom was sent ashore, and a shed made of corrugated iron allotted him. One evening, after being shut up for the night, he fancied a stroll, so quietly walked through the walls, as if they had been but so much paper, never heeding the crash that followed his exit. During his walk he came to a well, and well he knew it; standing on the edge was an old enemy of his, and here was a fine opportunity to "feed fat his ancient grudge." His keeper had been in the habit, when Tom wanted a drink, of making him draw his own water; this he did by hoisting the bucket up with his trunk, then, placing his foot on the rope, took a fresh haul, and so on until it reached the top. But now there was no keeper near, the bucket was temptingly near the edge; gradually, inch by inch, the cunning animal pushed the bucket until it over-balanced and fell, as Tom hoped, to be seen no more. But retribution quickly followed; as the bucket descended, whiz! round went the handle, so much to Tom's astonishment and terror that he never could be induced to go near the well again. Tom's antics and tricks would fill a volume of decent size. We have seen how little he attended to the wise saw of "Let well alone;" another wise saw, "Let sleeping dogs lie," receives as little attention; on the contrary, he delights in rousing them up. He used to wander about the best part of the night, and the dogs had a lively time of it; if they were on deck he was sure to find them, then, using one of his huge forelegs as a pendulum, he would commence swinging it over their bodies, gradually bringing it down until it crushed them; a growl followed, a kick followed the growl, and a howl the kick, and Tom went in search of a fresh victim. One unfortunate sick puppy, placed in his hut overnight, was found next morning resembling a paper dog; Tom had overlaid it like a careless mother. A large kangaroo bound that used to take possession of Tom's straw during his absence would be seen immediately after his return, shut out as if from a catapult, Tom's trunk being the propelling power. To see this huge animal playing with men was a strange sight, so careful not to injure them, letting them pile themselves on his back, trying to rub them off under the stays or against the ropes; hoisting them on his back with his trunk, or rolling about on the deck with all the abandon of a young kitten, yet not quite so graceful. His mode of resenting an affront was always odd and harmless—a push from his trunk, doubled up like a cushion to prevent a hard blow. The sentry one Sunday at divisions ordered Tom back into the hut. Tom went in with a look as much as to say, "I'll serve you out," waited until the marine had to repass the doorway on his beat, and then sent out a shower of small biscuit like hail. How like this trick is to the "Arabian Nights" story of the Elephant and Tailor.—Leisure Hours.

Equine Sagacity.

A resident of Whitby, England, a young gentleman named Keene, was lately visiting Malton, and when there, from Mr. Rutter, of Hessie Farm, he bought a hunting mare, which on leaving Malton he recently took with him to Whitby. One Wednesday the mare was missing from the field, and a search was instituted to no purpose. On Thursday the search was renewed; Mr. Keene and his groom going about ten miles on the Guisborough Moors, and then to Sleights, where they heard the mare had crossed the railway the previous morning. At this point the trail was easy. The mare had taken the high road homewards, and at Saltersgate six men tried to stop her, without avail. At Pickering she jumped a load of sticks and the railway gates, and then found herself in her old hunting country, making across Ryedale for "home." In so doing she would have to cross two rivers and a railway. Mr. Keene found her at home on Thursday night with one shoe thrown and rather lame, but otherwise no worse for her cross-country gallop of nearly sixty miles, done in one day, for her previous owner found her on the Wednesday night standing at the gate of the field where she had grazed for the two previous years.

— It is said that the war on the liquor sellers is very lively in New England. It is very lively in San Francisco, if we may judge by the force besieging the stronghold of every barkeeper in town. It must soon terminate, however, for all the barrooms are pretty well surrounded: the sinners have attacked in front, and the church people gone round to the rear.

Deep in the lily its odor lies, Hidden in beauty cold as snow; Only the south wind stoops as it flies, Stealing sweetness that dreams below.	When the rapture of life shall call, Low or loud, through my weary dream; When its lips on my slumber fall, Its eyes of summer above me gleam—
Deep in the heart of the Arab tale Sleeps the breath of a truth divine; Open thy petals, lily pale, Make the splendor and perfume mine.	Patient angel of strength and power, Guarding ever my wandering way, Pour thy sleep on the fateful hour, Hide mine eyes from the dawning day.
When the thrill of its kisses spread Life and bliss till the sleep must flee, Press thy wing on my restless head, Keep me sleeping and safe for thee!

The Savans and the Fat Woman.

In the Anthropological Department of the British Association, Sir Duncan Gibb, Bart., read the following "Note on the Fat Woman now exhibiting in London": As a rule, enormously fat women are rare when compared to the opposite sex, and they are deserving of a passing notice. But when their size depends to some extent upon muscular as well as adipose development, then there is a circumstance of interest to the curious in such matters. Caroline Heenan at present exhibiting in Oxford street, London, is now 22 years of age. She is 5 feet 8 inches high, and her weight is exactly forty stone, i. e., 560 lbs. This last is greater than the Kentucky giant or his wife, the Nova Scotian giantess, both 8 feet high, also now exhibiting in London. Caroline is 26 inches round the arm, 3 feet 6 inches across the shoulders, and 7 feet around the body; yet, with this large size, her hands are comparatively small and free from fat. Not only this, though the limbs are so large, they are not exclusively composed of fat, differing from most enormously fat persons. A large proportion of this is due to considerable muscular development, which not only her history confirms, but also an examination of the limbs themselves proves. The chest and abdomen are, of course, enormous, but it is not simple obesity. Her growth and enlargement, though truly so great, have been progressive from infancy upwards, and withal she has been able to sustain great muscular exercise that would have fatigued ordinary persons. Now, this is opposed to simple and pure adipose enlargement. At the age of fourteen, when weighing fourteen stone, she danced a minuet with one of the best dancers without any effort or fatigue. Her stages of growth were as follows: At nine months she was a large infant, and gained a prize at a baby show at Cincinnati, weighing 5 stone (70 lbs.). At five years she was 7 stone (98 lbs.); at nine years, 11 stone (154 lbs.); at fourteen, 24 stone (336 lbs.); at eighteen, 33 stone (462 lbs.); at twenty-two, 40 stone (560 lbs.) Her greatest period of growth was between the ages of nine and fourteen years of age. She is handsome and pleasing in appearance, the face is not fat nor greasy—it is highly intelligent, the eyes clear, of a bluish-grey color, and she is not in any way drowsy. She is a very moderate eater, and very active for her size, and if she keeps her health good, she will, in all probability, progressively increase in size as she gets older, and promises to become the largest and heaviest female that has yet been seen. Mrs. Cadman, of Midworth, weighed 378 lbs., and a fat woman I saw in Barnum's American Museum in New York, in March, 1849, weighed 578 lbs. This is greater than Caroline Heenan, but in that instance the poor woman could scarcely move, and was so sleepy she could hardly remain awake, and I infer she must have died not long afterwards. There have been heavier children than Caroline Heenan, but what is interesting in her is the progressive increase in weight and size from infancy, associated with considerable muscular development—a circumstance that is rare in the history of extraordinary fat people, whether male or female, and which must render Caroline Heenan an anthropological as well as a physical phenomenon. She is a native of Troy, New York, and her ancestors came from Ireland.

Communist Acts Justified.

A pamphlet defending the acts of the Commune, the execution of the hostages, etc., has just been published in Paris. The work purports to be written by a member for Paris, and is signed with the initials L. B. M. Louis Blanc, who is the only member for Paris whose initials are the same, complains of the publication as being calculated to make him appear the apologist of an insurrection he condemns, and of crimes he abhors.

— It is announced that a Coast Survey steamer is about to make a voyage of "exploration and discovery" to Rio Janeiro, the Straits of Magellan, Patagonia and San Francisco. If she do not succeed in discovering any of these places, she will probably go in quest of Utopia, Avalon, the Island of Lanterns and the hither end of Al Sirat.

Amusing Defeat of Home the Spiritualist.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Standard states that Home, the spiritualist, who for some weeks past has been the talk of the fashionable world there, has suffered a complete fiasco. The success he had met with in the salons of St. Petersburg appears to have turned his head. Judging the Russians by those who believed in him, he expected to find them all equally credulous, and in an evil hour he offered to exhibit his manifestations before a committee of scientific men. The challenge was accepted, the committee stipulating that the locality should be chosen by them; that instead of an ordinary table one of glass should be substituted, and that Home should not enter the room before the time fixed for the experiments. To these conditions Home consented. Six gentlemen, principally professors, met in a room especially prepared for the purpose in the University of St. Petersburg. He came at the appointed hours, expressed himself satisfied with the arrangements, and the party formed the chain round the table, and waited patiently for the rappings. A lamp, with a powerful reflector, prevented the possibility of any trickery under the table passing unnoticed, and for some time there was no indication of the appearance of the spirits. At length Home pretended to be aware of their presence by the wavering light of a candle on the table, but this was explained as being caused by the ventilator, which was immediately closed, and the candle burned steadily. Then he declared that the arrival of the spirits was announced by a peculiar rushing noise, which was heard by all present; but on searching for the cause it was found that a hot air-pipe had been left open, and on its being shut, the noise ceased. Rather out of countenance by the failure of the experiment thus far, Home next drew attention to the rapidity of his pulse; but this was shown to be the effect of the heat of the room and the excitement of straining the attention for such a length of time; moreover, one of the gentlemen present had exactly the same number of pulsations. Though baffled and confused, Home did not wish to give in, and offered to change the weight of any object in the room. For this the committee were prepared. A pail was placed in a pair of scales, and there it remained without moving the balance in the slightest degree. These experiments took up a great deal of time; everybody was tired; the trial was at an end; but, not wishing to acknowledge himself beaten, Home offered to meet the committee again on a future day. But the next morning he sent word that he was indisposed, and he left St. Petersburg two days after.

Co-operation in Ship Owning.

We extract from the Times the following interesting statement as to the recent progress of the shipping trade in the North of England, which shows, in another field, what has lately attracted some notice in connection with the Suez Canal—the rapidity with which screw steamers are gaining upon sailing ships in the carrying trade of the world: “The most remarkable circumstance in connection with the iron steam ship-building trade of 1870 in the North is the extraordinary increase in the number of steamers that have been built for local owners. The vessels are mostly held by partnerships, each share being of the value of between £200 and £300. North Shields, which had scarcely a ton of iron steam shipping five years ago, will have steam shipping property worth a million sterling, it is anticipated, by the end of 1871. There has been a very great increase in the number of iron steamers owned by Newcastle in 1870; and Sunderland and South Shields are going extensively into iron steam-shippping property. If the trade develops at the rate it has done during the past year, sailing ships in the Northern rivers in ten years’ time will be as rare as stage coaches in the streets of London. The steam-shippping of the North did well in 1870. Some of the steamers returned as much as forty per cent. to their owners, and very few of the new vessels made less than twenty-five per cent.” One of the reasons why steamers are so rapidly displacing sailing ships is no doubt the greater effectiveness of the same tonnage—a steamer, though a far more expensive article, doing several times the work of a sailing ship of similar capacity. Hence a single steamer of large size may easily cut out a whole fleet of sailing ships. The statement as to the profits of the new steamers is very remarkable, and there must be some special circumstances in the Northern trade to account for such large profits, when ship-owning generally has been unprofitable.

— At the recent annual games at Alloa, Scotland, the Alloa Advertiser says: “Perhaps the most amusing race was the pitcher and water race, in which each competitor had to carry a can containing water upon his head while running round the ring, and as a matter of course, the competitors were drenched before reaching the winning-post. This race elicited hearty laughter from the spectators, and the unlucky wights seemed thoroughly to enjoy the cooling which they had received.”

Political Alliances in Europe.--Foreshadowings of the Future.

For some weeks past it has been manifest that the hopes indulged so fondly by many, after the battle of Sedan and the subsequent fall of Paris, to the effect that the peace of Europe was for another decade, at least, effectually secured, were in great danger of not being fully realized. Strange, and not un frequently contradictory, rumors have been in the air. Emperors with their Prime Ministers have been moving from place to place; great diplomatic meetings have been announced; and new and ominous alliances have been spoken of as more or less certain. Suspense is at least relieved. We now know that something positive has been done. It is confidently stated that a thoroughly good understanding has been come to by the Imperial Government at Vienna and the Imperial Government at Berlin. We are told that at Gastein a basis was agreed upon whereby Germany and Austria should assume a joint attitude; and it is reported on what seems good authority, that the Emperor William and the Emperor Francis Joseph will meet on an early day, either at Salzburg or Coblenz, to perfect and give Treaty shape to the arrangements. It is also stated with confidence that the policy agreed upon by the Government at Vienna and the Government at Berlin commands the confidence and support of the Government of Italy. A dispatch to the London Telegraph puts the case more strongly by affirming that a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, has been concluded between Germany and Italy. On the other hand, it is known that there has been considerable coquetting going on for some time past between M. Thiers, the chief of the French Executive, and the Russian Government. There are some who are not unwilling to believe that France and Russia have agreed to act in concert in the event of any sudden outbreak of hostilities. The European situation is thus full of interest. Three of the greatest Powers are allied and evidently intend to stand or fall by each other. It is difficult to see how any combination can be made strong enough to resist Germany and Austria and Italy. It is not our opinion that there is any reason to doubt that such an understanding as that we have stated has been come to by the three Powers just mentioned. The attitude assumed by France on the one hand and by Russia on the other has made such an alliance at once necessary and possible. It was impossible for the Italian Government not to feel, during the recent discussions in the Assembly regarding the position of the Holy Father, that, if France had been to Italy a most useful ally, France might be to her a most dangerous foe. If France had the power, she most certainly had the will, to stand by the Holy Father against all the interests of the Italian Government and people. The language employed by many of the members of the majority in the Assembly was menacing in the extreme, and was capable of wounding the feelings of every Italian patriot. France might grow strong again and do what now she would do, if she had the power. Even M. Thiers, in his famous speech which removed the question out of the Assembly, went no further than to say that to intervene in favor of the temporalities of the Pope meant to go to war with Italy, and that to go to war with Italy would in present circumstances be impolitic and unwise.

Another Lord in Humble Life.

Occasionally a "real lord" becomes impatient of the restraints of his position, and attempts to adopt the life of "common folks." This was the case with Lord Ockham, Byron's grandson, and heir to his father's earldom of Lovelace. After a great deal of strange and troublesome conduct, Lord Ockham took regular employ in the yards of Mr. Scott Russell, the eminent London ship-builder. On one occasion, having need of money for the purchase of some instruments, he wrote to his grandmother, Lady Noel Byron, for the required sum, which was promptly supplied. The check was drawn to the order of Viscount Ockham, and he, accordingly, in his workman's dress, walked into a great London banking-house and presented it. The clerk glanced it, and then handed it back, saying, "It's drawn to order, and needs his lordship's endorsement;" upon which, to the indignation of the clerk, the rough mechanic seized a pen, and scribbled "Ockham" on the back. The scandalized clerk immediately signaled to the constable in attendance to arrest the forger, as he supposed, and the culprit was confronted with a partner. The clerk explained the circumstances. "Well," replied the offender, to the clerk's astonishment, "I am Lord Ockham." The partner, who knew the circumstances of the case well, looked steadily at the young man for a minute, and then said, "Yes, it's quite right; pay the check." Lord Ockham, at the time of his death, was engaged to a young girl of highly respectable antecedents, in humble life, whose parents were, almost to the last, ignorant of the real position of the suitor.

— Some nameless rascal is advertising the "vacuum cure," at No. 29 Kearny street. This method of treatment consists in producing a state of nothingness inside the head. Persons who design trying it are reminded that in their cases it is entirely unnecessary.

— Everybody is frightened about the cholera, and nobody takes any precautions against the women. And yet the latter "carry off" more men in one year than the cholera in two. The patients don't go quite so far, but they fare infinitely worse.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

[Report for the Week ending September 23d, 1871.]

— Our local money market is strong in coin and bullion, and it is now an admitted fact that interest rates have undergone a permanent reduction, much to the benefit of the whole mercantile, manufacturing, and agricultural classes. Those of our bankers and capitalists who most stickled for high prices, have receded and come to the rational conclusion that the time for high rates has completely expired, and that we must adapt ourselves to the condition of affairs which obtains in all other commercial centers. During a recent conversation with a prominent savings bank President, he remarked that in reference to loans made on a monthly repayable basis, the tables indicating 8, 9 and 10 per cent. were now exclusively used, whereas but a little while ago those of 11 and 12 per cent. per annum were the only ones in vogue. The multiplication of savings banks, as well as commercial banks, in interior towns is collecting the local dribblets and massing them for commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural purposes, and concentrating a pecuniary motive power heretofore dispersed and wasted, while it furnishes facilities and a stimulus to all legitimate pursuits. Treasure shipments per steamer Constitution, hence September 16th: To Callao, Bank of California, gold coin, $500,000; to England, B. Davidson & Co., silver bars, $62,454.28; London and S. F. Bank, silver bars, $48,408.44; to Panama, Eldridge & Irwin, gold coin, $5,000—total, $615,862.72. The amount sent overland, by express, during the week ended September 20th, was $162,225.83, in silver bars. The steamer Montana arrived from Mexican ports on the 17th with $92,615 in treasure.—Commercial Herald.

— Imports of Sugar from January 1st to Sept. 14th: Eastern, bbls, 10; Manila, lbs, 4,439,029; Hawaiian, lbs, 8,800,016, pkgs, 18,386; Peruvian, lbs, 7,665,327, pkgs, 10,202; Batavian, lbs, 7,820,527; Central American, lbs, 1,874,473, pkgs, 770; China, lbs, 1,522,527, pkgs, 11,753; Mexican, lbs, 676,921; Tahitian, lbs, 16,631, pkgs, 60. The arrivals of the week include the cargo of Manila per St. Joseph, 46,076 bags. This was a timely importation to the California Refinery, and goes into immediate use. Another cargo is expected by the same company. The demand for Hawaiian is continued. Sales since our last review aggregate 3,500 kegs at 8½@11½c.; extra choice, 11½c. The D. C. Murray, from Honolulu, brought 2,100 kegs. The demand is active for low and high grades; the medium grades are more plentiful and less called for. No Beet Sugar of the new crop has yet been delivered. There is no change in the prices of refined. We quote California Cube, 15c.; Circle A Crushed, 14½c.; Granulated, 14c.; Powdered, 14½c.—all in bbls; half bbls command ½c. more. Yellow Coffee and Golden C. 12½@13c., latter rate for extra. We are advised of a clearing out sale of 1,200 bbls Renmed White Peruvian, from the Alvarado Beet Sugar Mill to a jobber upon terms withheld.

— Imports of Coals from January 1st to Sept. 14th: Anthracite, tons, 5,573; Australian, tons, 18,350; Bellingham Bay, tons, 14,234; Coos Bay, tons, 19,533; Cumberland, cks, 2,474; English, tons, 18,571; Queen Charlotte Is., tons, 565; Vancouver Is., tons, 11,261; Sitka, tons, 18; Mount Diablo, tons, (8m) 83,605; Royal Mountain, tons, (8m) 918; Seattle, tons, 3,283. Imports of English have of late been quite free, with sales at $11@11.50 ex ship. West Hartley is, however, held at $14. Australian is held at $11.50, with sales. It is said that the bulk of that now en route from the Colonies is for account of consumers, thus leaving the market quite strong at the close.

— Imports of Coffee from January 1st to Sept. 14th: Rio, lbs, 827,360; Java, lbs, 311,830; Manila, lbs, 442,786; Hawaiian, lbs, 81,780; Central American, lbs, 8,691,020, pkgs, 1,499; Tahitian, lbs, 13,418; San Domingo, lbs, 2,790; Mocha, lbs, 1,650. Since the shipment of 3,400 bags Guatemala to St. Louis, referred to in our last, prices of all Greens have assumed greater firmness, with sales of Central American in lots, say 1,500 bags, at 16½@17c. Rio is now held at 16c. Small imports of Java by rail and via Panama continue to reach us from New York and Boston, selling readily at 34@25c. At the close, the price of Guatemala has been advanced to 17 cents.

— Imports of Tea from January 1st to September 14th: China, 535,104 lbs, 9,221 pkgs; Japan, 1,615,527 lbs, 13,876 pkgs. The demand from the East is continued, with a fair prospect of considerable increase, provided freights across the continent are not materially advanced. Musters sent to New York for appraisal, have been well treated, resulting in sales to some extent at enhanced rates, and the goods ordered by telegram to be sent to Chicago. The freight on Teas to New York is 3½c, and from Yokohama to New York, 4½c; at least, we are aware of existing contracts at these rates. We know of no considerable sales calculated to affect the present market. In fact, but few Teas of the new crop have yet been sold or received, the bulk of the arrivals going directly East by rail from steamer.

— Imports during the week have been of considerable importance, including several cargoes of English and Australian Coals; two or more cargoes of British goods, assorted; one vessel from Bordeaux, with a well-assorted cargo of French products; a large cargo of Sugar and Coffee from Manila; one of Sugar, Paddy, etc., from Honolulu, besides various other arrivals from coast ports, exclusive of three large cargoes from New York per ships Osceola, Gov. Morton and Seminole, and from Boston per Wm. Woodbury.

Court Chat.

— Every reader of French history is familiar with that splendid chapter in Carlyle's French Revolution in which the historian describes the condemnation, the sentence, and death of Louis XVI. From Wednesday to Sunday the question of guilt, punishment, and the time of his execution had been debated and decided, and at three o'clock on Sunday morning, by a majority of seventy-three, it was pronounced that the sentence should be carried out within twenty-four hours. A confessor was allowed to attend the King, and the faithful valet Cléry remained with him to the last. It was this devoted servant who dressed his hair for the guillotine, and to him Louis confided a ring which he took from his watch and kept trying on his finger; it was to be delivered to the Queen, for it was the ring of their marriage. After a lapse of nearly eighty years we hear again of this relic. A French paper announces that the Count of Limminghe and his wife (the daughter of Barthélemy Dumortier, the celebrated orator of the Belgian Chamber) started for Bruges with the purpose of making a gift of extraordinary value. There had come into the possession of the Count of Limminghe the ring which the King wore on the day of his execution, and also some locks of the hair which Cléry cut off from Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette on that terrible occasion. The Count thought that these relics ought to be in the possession of some relative of the deceased King, and he has determined to restore them to the Count of Chambord. The interest of this priceless gift is enhanced by the accompaniment of another present almost equally historical—a highly-finished sketch of the executions of Marie Antoinette and the King, taken on the spot by an English artist.

— A capital anecdote illustrative of the late Lord Palmerston's ready humor has been lately revived in fashionable circles. The town of Rugeley, in Staffordshire, for a time bitterly felt the disgrace of having given birth to the notorious Palmer, executed for poisoning people whose lives were insured, in connection with racing and betting transactions. Neighboring towns did not leave the scandal to die out. So uncomfortable did they make the people of Rugeley that a deputation was sent up to the Home Secretary, headed by the chief magistrate, to consult Lord Palmerston as to changing the name of the town. The Home Secretary listened with patience to the deputation, and on being asked to suggest another name said, with grim humor, "Why not Palmerstown?" The absurdity of the thing struck all present, and Rugeley did not change its name.—Leisure Hour.

— We give an extract from a composition on Don Pedro II, Emperor of Brazil, a monarch who honors a throne instead of being honored by it. It was written in 1852, and rendered into English from the Portuguese original by an American writer. If the poetic expression of the translation is not felicitous, the noble sentiments of the Royal author carry with them their own commendation:

"The Chair of Justice is the Throne;	Neglect of duty—always wrong—
Who takes it, bows to higher laws;	Detestable in young or old—
The public good, and not his own,	By him whose place is high and strong
Demands his care in every cause.	Is magnified a thousand fold."

— The Emperor and Empress of the French, accompanied by the Prince Imperial and their suite, proceeded to Chatham and thence down the Medway to inspect the Great Eastern steamship. The party embarked at Strood about one o'clock on board the Lady of Lorn steamer, which had been specially engaged. The inspection of the huge vessel lasted a considerable time. On returning up the Medway the Imperial party had a good view of the Glatton and the other vessels in the stream, the steamer being stopped for that purpose.

— The Archbishop of Madrid has taken a strong step on the question of civil marriages. He has issued a circular to his clergy enjoining them to refuse the sacraments to all persons who are married by civil rites only, unless they publicly manifest their repentance for not having conformed to the orders of the Church.

— M. Thiers is said to be greatly fatigued, and the medical men have advised him to take some repose, which has become indispensable. He appears to have an affection in one eye, the result of too continuous labors, especially by lamplight. Doctor Desmarest recently declared that the Head of the Executive must give up all working at night.

— His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales arrived at Hombourg on the 28th ult., attended by F. Knollys and Lord Clonmell, where it was understood he intended remaining three or four days. His Royal Highness tried his luck the same evening at treble et quarante, and lost—indeed, Dame Fortune was adverse to all the Royal party.

— Among the visitors at Ostend are His Highness the Duke of Olenburg, the Prince of Fursenburg, Princess Hohenlohe, Prince Boloselski, Prince George de Galitzin, the Prince de Santantino, Prince George de Croy and the Princess of Ossuna, the Duke and Duchess of Eognara, the Duke of Lorge, and the Duke of Manchester.

— A second meeting between the Emperors of Germany and Austria is contemplated, and it is rumored that an alliance will be formed between Germany, Austria and Italy. This alliance is declared to be to secure the peace of Europe, and may possibly be joined by Russia.

— His Majesty the King of the Belgians, accompanied by Count d'Oultremont and suite, have left London. His Majesty and suite embarked for Ostend from Dover the last day of August.

Special Brevities.

— The late Mr. Grote, speculating on the future state of mankind, says: "In the future world, as compared with this, we may suppose the presence of God will be, as in our material world is the bright sunshine compared with the dim twilight. The sun, the more bright and glorious, and gladdening, and soul-elevating it is, is not necessarily on that account the only thing to be looked at, and thought of; it is seen in the light it gives, and thought of for the delight which it gives. So even in another world may it be with God; the clearer we see Him, the better and the more rightly may we see and know all besides Him, all His creatures, and all that He has made. We have no reason to think that our fellow-beings will be less interesting to us, or less cared for by us, there than here. It is the nearer presence and the clearer view of Him which will be the source of the truer understanding of, and better sympathy with, Him."

— Some years ago a conjurer was performing his tricks in a room beneath which was a grocer's store containing a barrel of gunpowder. By some accident the powder exploded, treating the conjurer and spectators to an unexpected aerial trip, and landing them promiscuously in the neighboring gardens. Among others was a sailor, who found himself on his back among some cabbages, and not much the worse for his "traject," as artillerists call it. Jack got up, shook himself, rubbed his eyes, and then exclaimed, "—the fellow, what's he agoin' to do next?" Jack thought that it was a coup de main; he knew nothing about a coup d'état! Political conjurers do play strange tricks.

— The semi-tropical heat with which London has been favored, has led to the introduction, in a quiet corner of Surrey, of midnight croquet parties. Mrs. Anderson, of Bramley, gave a party of the kind. The company numbered some sixty persons. The guests arrived at ten o'clock, and played at croquet by the light of Chinese lanterns, with which the grounds were illuminated. Under such circumstances, that which would have been a sort of penance in the mid-day heat became a novel enjoyment during the cooler hours. At midnight precisely the company separated.—London Opinion.

— Captain Moncrief has received £15,000 from the British Government for his invention, £500 for expenses, £1,000 a year for salary, £2,000 for back salary; and as yet, we believe, the War-office has not issued any of his gun-carriages to the service. Although Captain Scott's carriage is in use on nearly every ship in the navy, he has not received a farthing, and has been asked to accept £2,000 for his invention. The representatives of Mr. Snider are to receive a further large payment. It is expected that nearly £30,000 will be paid in all for his invention.—London Globe.

— The Philadelphia Ledger has a piece of news very pleasant to read this hot weather: "The supply of ice in New England is reported to be very abundant, and on the Kennebec River, Maine, there are three hundred thousand tons of ice still stored. It is stated that last winter over four hundred thousand tons of ice were cut and stored within a radius of fifteen miles of Boston, and the competition of the different ice companies has reduced the price at least 50 per cent. lower than it was last year, and also lower than it has been for the last five years."

— Two little boys, who were familiarly called Tom and Jack, on their first day at school were asked their names; to which the first replied "Tom." "That is not polite," said the teacher; "your real name is Thom-as. And now, my little man," turning to Jack, whose face seemed suddenly to brighten up with the light of a new idea, "what is your name?" "Jack-as!" triumphantly exclaimed the little urchin.

— Two countrymen, observing the female figures with pitchers in their hands which supported the porticoes of St. Pancras church, New-road, London, wondered what they represented. They must be the "foolish virgins," said one. "They can't be neither," replied the other: "there's only four of 'em." "Oh, it's all right," replied the friend; "the other is gone for the oil, you may depend on't."

— The August flight of meteors has punctually kept its time this year. M. Chapelas, in the Comptes Rendus, in a Memoir on Shooting Stars, attempts to prove that there are two meteoric currents, one having a constant direction in the higher regions, while the other, which is much nearer the earth's surface, varies its direction with the time of the year.

— M. Dumas, Als, announces that the removal of his father's remains and the funeral service originally fixed for the 24th of last month will not take place until the evacuation by the Prussians of the department of the Aisne, in which the last resting-place of the author of "Monte Cristo" is fixed.

— They tell of a colored girl who rushed into a colored citizens arms at Savannah, exclaiming, "Oh, you are my long lost brother!" She soon discovered her mistake, and rushed off in a confused manner, accompanied by her long lost brother's pocket book.—Philadelphia Ledger.

— A sixpenny rate for telegrams would be a boon which many people will highly appreciate, and this boon, according to the Civilian, is likely to be conceded before long in Great Britain.

— The Avenir Libéral says that Monsignor Dupanloup is preparing a work on "The Situation," which will make as profound a sensation as any of his writings under the Empire.

— In the United Kingdom £89,000,000 were expended last year in ardent spirits, £58,000,000 of which was by the working classes.

The Prayer.

A pair of dimpled knees bent on the floor,
 Two little dove-like eyes half shut in sleep,
 A little gold-ringed head—this through the door
 I hear—asking the Lord "a crystal soul" to keep.
 The crimson cheeks seem by dawn's finger's stained;
 The dimpled hands, clasped by the angels, seem
 As sunset's amber, o'er her head is rained.
 Kindling her curls with many a tapering gleam.
 Wreathed are her tiny feet with stories old,
 Till rose-leaf atmospheres, methinks I see,
 Enwrap them in their soft, ethereal fold,
 With love's protection, to the dimpled knee;
 For still the baby-songs and tales will please,
 As when at first, like bits from silken skein,
 She tried to knot them, sitting on my knees,
 In baby accents, into threads again.
 The little velvet lips just parted are,
 Through which the white-winged thoughts troop forth to rise,
 As, through an opening bud, perfumes afar
 Invisibly are wafted to the skies.
 Now to her downy couch my darling's crept,
 Where her bright curls, like jonquils in the snow,
 Gleam out, as if the sunbeams there had swept
 A little rift for such sweet flowers to grow. —Charlotte Corder.

The Cholera--Precautions.

In view of the continued ravages of cholera in the eastern hemisphere, and its certain advent here, our authorities have a duty to perform which should be most strongly urged upon them. While commending to their immediate notice the proper sanitary protections which the urgency of the case calls for, we would mention the probable danger from the air being charged with the deleterious gasses of decomposing animal matter. In visiting the Cemetery at Lone Mountain, a few days ago, the effluvia was peculiarly offensive, and the prevailing winds waft it into populous parts of our city. We may remark that were every coffin, when interred, covered for a depth of two or three inches with charcoal, broken into small fragments, there would be no further evolving of these sickening odors, the effects of which would be but as fuel to the fire of the raging epidemic when it comes upon us. The expense would be but trifling, and as it has been applied successfully in older cities, it is most desirable that such sanitary measures should be here made compulsory. The absorption of gasses by carbon, and their subsequent decomposition into innocuous reform matter, is too well known to chemists to require comment. Cases of cholera are already reported in England, and even in New Jersey—with what truth we are unable to say. But it is denied that it is abating in Russia, and it is positively asserted that there is still an average of one hundred and fifty deaths per day in Kiev.

The provinces of St. Petersburg, Moscow, Wilna, Riasan, Tambov, Pskov, Olonetz, Novgorod, Yaroslavl, Vladimir, Nishni-Novgorod, Vologda, Kostroma, Kassin, Tver, Tula, Smolensk, Saratov, Mohilev, and Suwalki, are officially stated to be infected. Moscow, Vladimir, and Suwalki—the latter bordering on East Prussia has spread the disease to German territory—are at present the districts most severely visited by the plague. Poland proper is as yet exempt. Reliable statistics as to the number of cases are wanting, but the vast extent of its area, together with what we hear, leads to the conclusion that the disease this time is not to be made light of. In Prussia, where the circles of Lyck, Pilkallen, Oletzko, and Insterburg, have been attacked, Königsberg remains the hotbed of the epidemic. In Berlin and other cities the police authorities have been directed by the Prussian Home Office to pay the strictest attention to the state of the sewers and cesspools. The sale of unripe or rotten fruit is prohibited. The American ship Lovello, from Hamburg, has arrived at Cardiff with four of her crew, it is asserted, dead from cholera. The vessel has, of course, been detained at quarantine. To households we would say all that he can do when the cholera comes, and even before it comes, is first to thoroughly clean out his cistern; secondly, to boil and filter through a charcoal filter every drop of water used for drinking purposes; and, thirdly, as far as in him lies, to keep a healthy habit and a cheerful mind. All these precautions are simple matter of absolute necessity. Cisterns are, unless frequently cleaned out, positive reservoirs of impurity, filth, poison, and disease. Nothing will cleanse foul water but boiling and filtering it.

— We note that a parson, whose name is given as Schunemann-Pott, and whose field of usefulness appears to be Encinal Station, Alameda, took eight infantile converts, last Sunday, and damped them down according to the rites of the church. At last accounts five of them were laid up with a fever, and the other three were singing "I'b a-goig hobe to die do bore!"

Railroad Changes.

A great deal has lately been said in condemnation of a supposed combination between the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Pacific Mail, to advance the rates of freight and passage between this city and the East. No official notice of any such combination has been received at the offices in this city. It is very probable, however, that an advance in rates, upon certain classes of freights, will take place. It is natural that people who have to pay these increased rates should protest. We regard it as a business in which it will be both unwise and useless to raise a clamor. The officers of the railroad understand the terms upon which they can afford to transport freight, and are not likely to do anything that will decrease the business of their line. The expenses of the Company are enormous. They are constructing new lines, which require immense outlays without a possibility of immediate return. Every cent so disbursed is an immediate benefit, direct and indirect, to the State, and a present loss to them. If it is to their interest now to increase the rates, a few years will make it equally to their interest to lower them. The matter is that sort of evil which corrects itself. We do not know that we can do better than to quote from a recent letter of the Hon. Edward Curtis, in relation to this subject. Mr. Curtis says: "The property controlled by the Central Pacific Railroad Company is to-day paying nearly one-tenth of the entire taxes of the State—that it has raised the value of real estate along and near its lines more than $50,000,000—and that it has brought into market millions of acres of agricultural, timber and mineral lands, that were worthless before its iron lines penetrated them. The completion of this railway struck down at one blow the prices of about everything we imported from the East, on an average of 33 per cent., by creating competition between the Panama steamers and the railroad; which competition reduced freight charges very materially; and therefore the prices of all goods, materials and implements, we are obliged to get from the Atlantic side. * * * Before there was a trans-continental railway, it took twenty-three days to make the journey to New York—now it is easily done in seven, and at a cost to each passenger of at least $100 less than formerly. Taking 30,000 passengers, which is the lowest average number who up to the year 1869, annually traveled by steamers, to and from California, and counting the sixteen days time now saved by the railroad, at two dollars per day, counting also the $100 saved in expenses, and we have a net annual gain of $4,960,000 to the traveling public, by reason of the Pacific Railroad. Nor is this all: 25,000 persons have been induced to come here during the past year, to see our Yo-Semite, and other wonders, who never would have come, had they been compelled to endure the hardships, loss of time, and inconveniences of an ocean voyage to get here. It is a low estimate to say that these extra visitors leave with us an average of $250 each, for his or her personal expenses while in California, making $6,250,000, added to the wealth of our State in one year, from this source alone. So that the saving in expenses to Californians who travel Eastward and return, together with the money made from the extra influx of tourists and other visitors, amounts to more than $11,000,000 per annum, net gain to this State, because of the building of the Central Pacific road. At least $3,000,000 more are saved to us in reduced freights. The great number of silver and gold mines, located in this State and Nevada, and owned by residents of California, that are now being successfully worked, but which would have remained untouched and useless, were it not that this railroad runs near them, must add to our annual resources as much as $6,000,000 more. Putting the facts together and we have in round numbers $20,000,000 saved to the people of California, as the fruits of one year's business with the Central Pacific Railroad. Twenty millions of dollars—a sum larger than the value of our entire wheat crop for any year since California was a State. An amount seven times as great as the sum total of all the taxes collected by the State in the year 1870. The mighty fact of $20,000,000 now being annually saved, or made to the people of this commonwealth, ought not to render unpopular the corporation that has been the direct cause of all this material wealth." Certainly it would seem as if the people ought to be a little more patient of what they deem "exorbitant" charges of a company that puts $20,000,000 into their pockets annually.

— The daily newspapers are tugging and sweating to make science popular. Their latest means toward this commendable end is the publication of an account of a new "cosine galvanometer," from which the following is a random extract. (We do not give the whole description, for fear our readers will kill us): "Many determinations of the same current can be made with the new instrument by forming a table of the values of the cosines of different angles of inclinations in terms of the deflection of the needle which currents of a known resistance produced when interposed." We regret that not one of our contemporaries has indicated the name and address of the man from whom this useful and economical device may be procured, and the number of dollars that would be considered a fair equivalent for the distress of parting with it. Probably the owner does not wish to be overwhelmed with orders, and has kept the location of his factory a secret; at the same time furnishing the description from which we have quoted, so that every man may make and operate one for himself.

The Poet Zozimus.

About thirty-five years ago a tall blind man used to stand at the corner of Essex Bridge, Dublin, singing and reciting ballads which, if not very remarkable for wit, were more or less attractive to his audience on account of their singularity. The Homeric beggar possessed some of the sturdiness of Eddie Ochiltree and had a certain pride in his calling, and in the fact of his being looked up to as the king of street minstrels. Even still, in Ireland, the street minstrel pursues his occupation in a more interesting fashion than that in which the same business is carried on by the ruffians who chant vulgar ribaldry in our lanes or public parks; but in the days when Zozimus flourished the craft had retained an importance derived from its connection with the political history of the country. It is well known that Swift employed the Dublin ballad-singers to chant and hawk about some of his rhyming squibs, and several of the chief opponents of the Union engaged the ragged followers of the gay science to a musical crusade against the Castle authorities. The poet Zozimus derived his name from the fact of his having composed a lyric on the discovery in the desert of St. Mary of Egypt by a pious ecclesiastic called Zozimus. His biographer informs us that he was usually dressed in a heavy, coarse, long-tailed coat and a very much worn hat, with exceedingly strong shoes. He recited or declaimed pieces of a sacred turn interspersed with odd asides to the crowd, and always introducing himself with a sort of prologue:

"Ye sons and daughters of Erin attend,
Gather round poor Zozimus, yer friend.
Listen, boys, until yer hear
My charming song."

One of his most striking and effective readings was that of a romantic version of the story of Moses in the bulrushes. This he always prefaced by inquiring "Is there a crowd about me now? Is there any blackguard heretic listenin' to me?" Having been satisfied on these points, Zozimus is reported to have delivered a series of stanzas of which the following may serve as a specimen:

"In Egypt's land, upon the banks of Nile,
King Pharaoh's daughter went to bath in style,
She tuk her dip, then walked unto the land,
And to dry her royal pelt, she ran along the strand.
"A bulrush tripped her, whereupon she saw
A smiling babby in a wad o' straw,
She tuk it up, and said with accents mild,
"Tare-and-agers, girls, which av yez owns the child?"

Zozimus could sing of his garret as gally as Béranger:

"Gather round me, boys, will yez Gather round me! And hear what I have to say, Before ould Sally brings me My bread and jug of tay.	"I live in Faddle alley, Off Blackpits near the Comb; With my poor wife called Sally, In a narrow, dirty room."
---	--

The poet, living in the O'Connell era, was a great admirer of the agitator, and celebrated O'Connell's election to the mayoralty with much enthusiasm. Zozimus died on Friday, April 3, 1846. A priest who went to visit him found the bard in a miserable room, lying on a straw pallet and surrounded by a horde of ballad-singers, to whom it seems he was teaching the doggerel that was no longer of much use to him. "How are you, Mike?" said the priest. "I'm dictatin'," was the characteristic reply of the minstrel. He had a grand wake, and a funeral which, no doubt, Zozimus would have enjoyed but for the inactive part he was compelled to take in it. A periodical in Dublin has been recently started in the name of the gifted mendicant, and beyond a question Zozimus deserves a centenary festival of some sort from his countrymen, who have only lately made an effort to rescue his memory from oblivion.—Pall Mall Gazette.

— One can endure with tolerable patience a justification of mothers-in-law, and may smile good-naturedly at a defense of creditors. Free love and poor relations are so commonly upheld as to excite only a temperate indignation. But when the Boston Traveller descends to the fathomless infamy of defending musquitos we feel injured. That we cannot, and do not wish to, endure. We believe that even Mr. Bergh at his craziest never thought of upbraiding any one for insulting a musquito. Horace Greeley, in his great work upon farming, expressly says that "the musquito should be carefully uprooted, and the stalk burned, or it will multiply so rapidly as to choke out the late-sown grain and ruin the soil by sucking out all the quinine." We should suppose that the Traveller would be ashamed of itself.

Lips that are met in love's	Behold! the sullen year
Devotion sweet,	Will naught reveal
While parting lovers passionately greet,	Of its set purpose, if for woe or weal,
And earth thro' heaven's arc more swiftly	Though flowing swift as waters o'er the
Oh, will they be less drear [moves—	Mayhap the end draws near [weir—
Within a year?	Within the year.

Dear women's eyes full soon and plainly	Absence, new friends, I fear not overmuch
Oh, will you give such cheer [tell—	Even Death, should he appear
This time a year?	Within the year.

Pacific Coast Wrecking Company.

Those of our citizens who are ready to engage in speculations based upon well ascertained facts, conducted in a thoroughly businesslike and energetic manner, and the operations of which are superintended by competent and experienced men, have now offered to them one worthy of their notice. We do not address ourselves to those flighty individuals of Cocos Island proclivities, whose brainless imaginations are forever grasping at mythical gains—for to such enterprises, carefully entered upon by sound business men, present no charms. To the thoughtful, however, we would say examine into the prospects of this newly incorporated company, whose first undertaking is the recovery of the treasure lost in the Spanish frigate Leocadia, on the coast of Ecuador. She was sent by the Spanish Government collecting tribute money on the Pacific Coast 70 years ago. She has laid within 200 yards of the shore ever since. From time to time small sums have been recovered by native divers, but amounting to but little in the aggregate. The inefficient means at the disposal of the Ecuador Government and the limited amount of scientific knowledge possessed by them have hitherto precluded their making any systematic effort to recover the immense amount of specie known to be on board. According to official records, the treasure is known to have been between four and five millions of dollars, of which about a tenth part has been recovered at various times. The difficulties which to Ecuador folks appeared to be insurmountable are much less than those which interfered with the recovery of the $1,200,000 treasure on the Golden Gate, and which was so successfully wrecked by the experienced Capt. Parker, after men of less knowledge of the business hand signally failed. Availing themselves of Capt. Parker's known ability, some enterprising gentlemen of this city engaged him to survey the wreck of the Leocadia. Having made a thorough examination of her position, Capt. Parker has declared that there can be no doubt of the whole of the specie being recovered, and has expressed his willingness to engage in the undertaking, looking solely to success for his remuneration. An offer made to the Government of Ecuador has been accepted, and in consideration of receiving 5 per cent. of the amount as it is recovered, have given the exclusive right to wreck the frigate to the associated gentlemen who have taken the initiative. In order to properly equip the expedition they have determined to dispose of a limited number of shares. The capital of the Company is to be $150,000, divided into 1,500 shares of $100 each. The trustees are H. B. Platt, S. P. Taylor, O. Fuller, T. J. Smiley, and A. Camman, to manage the affairs of the Company for the first three months of its existence. The office of the Company is 310 Montgomery street, where prospectuses can be obtained and all information afforded.

— We feel justified in the inference that the United States naval service possesses some features objectionable, or at least unattractive, to the mind of the average man. Since the man-o'-war California has been lying at Vallejo, more than one hundred and fifty men have deserted from her. We know of but one way to remedy this evil of desertion: let the Piscatorial Acclimatizers people the bay with sharks, and Jack will be afraid to swim ashore. To keep the sharks vigilant, and entice them to hang about the ship, an occasional officer might be hung overboard.

Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. J. C. Crawford, in a paper read before the Wellington Philosophical Society, contrasted New Zealand with Australia. He said: "New Zealand is a well-watered, Australia a badly-watered country. In the former colony one can hardly go for a few hundred yards without finding a stream, whereas, even in the better parts of Australia, the traveler may ride for a whole day before reaching a stream or a water-hole. Australia has a continental, New Zealand an insular, climate. Steady weather is the rule in Australia; in New Zealand, constant change is the fashion. In Australia the mountain ranges only in one instance exceed 4,000 feet in height. In New Zealand, Mount Cook approaches Mount Blanc in elevation, and heights of 10,000 feet are common. In the North Island are the volcanic cones of Mount Egmont, Rnapeha and Tongariro, the two former about 9,000 feet in height. The small cones in Victoria are molehills in comparison, and are exceeded in height by numerous minor ones in the province of Auckland. In fact, the New Zealand Cordillera is on such a scale of magnitude that it would well form the backbone of a continent. The rivers of the provinces of Canterbury and Otago, if united on lower plains, might make a Ganges or an Indus; and the western rivers alone of the province of Wellington might, united, equal the Rhine or the Rhone. Such scenery as the sounds and harbors of the southwest coast of New Zealand—Milford Haven, Bligh Sound, Dusky Bay, etc.—is quite unknown in Australia. These deep inlets penetrate into the mountains, and cliffs several thousand feet in height look down upon the tiny ship which ventures into these solitary waters. In fine, geographically, there are many points of resemblance between Australia and New Zealand, while, topographically, there is great contrast. The fauna and flora are, upon the whole, essentially different." South. Cross.

Death of a Sagacious News Dog.

The shrewdness of the news boys of our large towns is proverbial; but it is somewhat unusual to find amongst the canine species the sagacity displayed by a news dog called Blucher, which has just departed this life at Runcorn, to the regret of the inhabitants, by whom it was greatly petted. The animal in question, which was a half-bred retriever and sheep dog, belonged to Mr. Wase, eating-house keeper, Mersey street, and for the last twelve months went regularly to the shop of Miss Jones, of Bridge street, at 8 A. M., for a copy of the Liverpool Mercury, and at noon for the Daily Telegraph. This clever animal went regularly on his errand without any instructions, and started with the punctuality of the clock, always arriving at the shop at the same time. How the dog could thus regulate his movements is inexplicable; but it is insinuated that he always looked at the Town Hall clock as he passed, and if he was a trifle too early he loitered on the road, or if he found himself behind time he quickened his pace. On entering the stationer's shop he placed his front feet upon the counter, received the paper in his mouth, and then cantered home, carefully watching that no other animal seized his prize. Amongst the stories told of the dog is the following: One day the newspaper was not delivered as usual, and Blucher could nowhere be found, until he was discovered shut up in one of his master's rooms. The moment the door was opened the faithful creature ran down stairs, jumped over the counter, and galloped with all speed to the stationer's for the newspaper, which he took back with evident satisfaction. It appears, however, that Blucher did not exercise the same sagacity in other matters, for it is believed that his death was occasioned by eating flies which had died from the effects of poison.

—Mazzini says that the "doctrines preached by the leaders and principal members of the International are as follows: 1. The denial of God, who is the only, eternal and unshakable Foundation of our duties and rights. 2. The denial of the Fatherland and the nation, namely, of the points of support which you may all employ to save your interests and those of humanity. 3. The denial of all personal property, namely, of every inducement to produce more than what is absolutely necessary for daily life. Property, when it is the result of work, represents physical activity, as thought represents intelligence. These few words will suffice to teach you that the International can in no way be of use to your cause."

—While gunning the other day, Mr. Harkness of Plumas County saw a grizzly bear in the top of a high tree—a favorite spot with these agile brutes—and training his blunderbuss upon him exploded the charge. The grizzly swayed a few moments from side to side, then fell and doubled down across a branch, seventy-five feet from the ground. Here the carcass was permitted to remain until the advent of a passing coroner, who ordered the tree cut down. Deceased was very much respected by all who knew him, including a wife and seven children; but, in the words of Mr. Harkness, who is plunged into unutterable grief by the occurrence, "if 'd be a comfort to know w'at mischief old Harvey was a-driving at up tier' in the tree top."

The Campbells' Clanswoman.

The Campbell's are coming—are coming it strong!
 They subscribed for a necklace full two feet long;
 One thousand four hundred in pounds was its cost;
 For, so rare an occasion ought not to be lost;
 So, they sent to each man and went to each man
 Who could call themselves members of that famous clan,
 And they gathered the sum that I mentioned, the same,
 From one thousand one hundred of Campbells by name,
 From women and men, and from lads and from girls;
 And they purchased the finest of diamonds and pearls,
 As a right regal ornament, fitted to deck
 Their Marchioness-Princess' most beautiful neck.
 So they gave her the necklace, henceforth to be worn
 By the wife of their chieftain, the Marquis of Lorn;
 And she charmed all their hearts when she prettily said,
 "She was now their clanswoman since she had been wed."
 So, here's a hip, hip, hurrah! to the famed Campbell clan,
 From which our fair Princess selected her man.

Mignot's Ice and Refrigerating Machine.

A new Company, under the above title, has been formed, with a capital of £100,000, divided into 5,000 preference shares of £10 each, and 5,000 ordinary shares of £10 each. Its object is to purchase the valuable patent rights of Leon Mignot for improved machinery for making ice, cooling liquids, and various other refrigerating purposes. The prospectus states that negotiations are already on foot for granting exclusive licenses to work the patent in the East Indies, Mauritius, and Ceylon. Arrangements are also in progress for granting licenses for the manufacture of ice in many important centers in Great Britain. The principle of producing cold by means of compressing and expanding the atmospheric air is well understood, but the successful practical application of it has been rendered difficult on account of the insufficiency of the means hitherto employed to remove the heat of the air which is generated during its compression. The advantage of Mignot's invention is, that by the injection of water in the form of spray into the air during the compressing action, the high temperature caused by the compression is at once reduced, and the resistance considerably diminished; and as the compression and expansion take place simultaneously, the work expended for the compression is given back, less a small difference by the expansion. The result is a saving of fuel and driving power, and as no chemicals are required, the working of the machine is more economical. It is proposed to erect the first ice-works at a suitable place in or near London, with a plant of machinery capable of producing from 40 to 50 tons of clear ice per day. Messrs. Nasmyth, Wilson & Co., Patricroft Foundry, near Manchester, have lately made for Mr. F. Label, of 21, St. Nicholas-lane, London, an ice-making machine on the principle of the patent of M. Mignot, of Paris. This machine, which is but of small size, working at a pressure of 60 pounds to the square inch, produces about 50 pounds of ice per hour at an expense of about 18 pence.

— A simple person writes to the Alta, proposing a plan by which the Republicans may secure an honest County Committee. We have not examined the simple person's method, but the following is a better one: First, take the members of the present Committee into some unfrequented street and lay them in a row just outside the sidewalk, with their heads on the curbstone. Second, select an ordinary cobble-stone and with it hammer each head until it shall resemble a water-melon with a saw-log rolled across it. Third, elect your honest County Committee, either by the simple person's method or some other.

— The Sacramento Union persists in affirming that Leland Stanford has prohibited its sale upon the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad and its branches. This is emphatically denied by the newsman who has the contract for selling papers on those routes. Having no personal feeling in this matter, we are not competent to decide it with satisfaction to ourselves. This we know: if we owned a mule, and any public speaker made a business of denouncing that mule as an ass, that mule should not assist in giving publicity to the libel by carrying that public speaker from town to town.

— The Board of Education has decided to give one hundred religious books to the State Prison. This is a step in the right direction; hitherto there have been in that institution no adequate means of torment. Hereafter, refractory prisoners, instead of being permitted to depend from a beam by the thumbs, may be compelled to read those religious books.

Death of a Lady Naturalist.—Inventor of the Aquarium.

The greatest female naturalist of our day, Madame Jenette Power, has just died in Bergamo. Madame Jenette Power was a French woman, by birth, but married to an Irish gentleman, Mr. James Power, director of the Submarine Telegraph Company, in Paris. The deceased lady was known as the discoverer of the manner in which the shell of the mollusks is formed, and her experiments upon this subject are amongst the most curious of the age. It is to Madame Jenette Power that we owe likewise the invention of the aquarium. Long before it became generally known, she had established in Messina, in Sicily, the apparatus from which all others have been taken. It was a simple iron cage sunk ten or twenty fathoms in the sea, through the bars of which the fish, whose habits she wished to study, were unable to escape, while the living water, continually renewed, made them unconscious of captivity. Upon the top of this iron cage Madame Jenette Power was wont to lie for whole days together, intently watching the habits of the mollusks she had captured, and whose shells she had purposely broken. The result was a complete scientific victory, and the whole system, whose many generations of success had failed to discover, was revealed at once. By this constant application Madame Power was also enabled to reestablish the theory of Aristotle concerning the reproduction of any portion of the living fish, which had been denied through long ages. She presented to the Académie des Sciences several subjects on which she had operated with success. Her last work relates to the formation of the meteoric bodies called aërolites, which she affirms to be nothing more than substances collected by the whirlwind, fused together by the rotatory motion, and hurled with violence to the earth.

Substitute for Dueling.

A correspondent furnishes us with an account of the following incident which has just occurred in a burrison town on the banks of the Rhine. On a certain day last week a party of German officers were dining together, when a dispute arose to which a lady—arose between two of them. Words ran so high that finally both declared that they could only be satisfied by bloodshed, and as dueling is not allowed, they adopted another horrible means of settling their quarrel. It was agreed that they should stake their lives on a throw of the dice, and whichever threw the lowest number was bound, by the word of honor, to leave his own brains out. The unlucky number was thrown by a brave young officer who had gone through the life campaign, with distinction, and had been rewarded with the Iron Cross. He at once prepared for his fate by writing a letter to his mother, who happened to be absent, and making his will, and then, the very same evening, he faced his manly promise. His death, and the military funeral he was given, created a life excitement in the town, but, apparently, the feeling apparent in the minds of the inhabitants was that expressed by the husband of the lady, who said to me, "It was very funny now." The whole actor in the tragedy discussed the event quite calmly the next day in the table d'hôte room.

The Attempt to blow up Rothschild's Bank.

The Court of Assizes at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine has just tried a Frenchman named Muller for writing a threatening letter to Baron de Rothschild, and for attempting to blow up the banking house of that firm. On the 19th April last he sent a demand for money, and not receiving it, he laid down some pounds of dynamite against the house and set fire to them, but they exploded without doing harm. The man admitted that Muller is not his name, but refused to give any further account of himself than that his family and name-place had suffered much by the invasion that he had resorted to indemnify them at the cost of some wealthy German town. The jury brought in a verdict that he was insane, and acquitted him.

— A ticket in the Havana Lottery which has drawn a prize of one hundred thousand dollars is said to be held by persons in this city. The regular begging committees from the Young Men's Christian Association, and the various religious churches are requested not to call until the names and addresses of the lucky possessor have been ascertained. Persons will refrain from denouncing the simplicity of lotteries until their necessities shall have secured as many donations as possible. The poor need not apply; they will be served at their residences.

— On Wednesday evening last, Mrs. Isabella Stuart gave a lecture at Oakland, upon the "Habits and Customs of the Aborigines of Australasia." Five hundred persons from near and far were securing upon the "Habits and Customs of the Extinct White Tribes of Oakland." And the knowledge imparted will not be very edifying, either.

A Sunset on Yarrow.

The wind and the day had lived together, Far in the south, the summer levin
 They died together and far away Flushed, a flame in the grey soft air;
 Spoke farewell in the sultry weather, We seemed to look on the hills of heaven;
 Out of the sunset, over the heather, You saw within, but to me twas given
 The dying wind and the dying day. To see your face, as an angel's, there.
 Never again, ah surely never Shall we wait and watch, where of old we stood,
 The low good-night of the hill and the river,
 The faint light-fade, and the wan stars quiver,
 Twain grown one in the solitude. —Macmillan's Magazine

Mrs. Siddons' First Study of Lady Macbeth.

It was my custom to study my characters at night, when all the domestic cares and business of the day were over. On the night preceding that in which I was to appear in this part for the first time, I shut myself up as usual, when all the family were retired, and commenced my study of Lady Macbeth. As the character is very short, I thought I should soon accomplish it. Being then only twenty years of age, I believed, as many others do believe, that little more was necessary than to get the words into my head, for the necessity of discrimination and the development of character, at that time of my life, had scarcely entered into my imagination. But to proceed. I went on with tolerable composure, in the silence of the night (a night I never can forget), till I came to the assassination scene, when the horrors of the scene rose to a degree that made it impossible for me to get farther. I snatched up my candle, and hurried out of the room in a paroxysm of terror. My dress was of silk, and the rustling of it as I ascended the stairs to go to bed, seemed to my panic-struck fancy like the movement of a spectre pursuing me. At last I reached my chamber, where I found my husband fast asleep. I clapped my candlestick down upon the table, without the power of putting the candle out, and I threw myself on my bed, without daring to stay even to take off my clothes. At peep of day I rose to resume my task; but so little did I know of my part when I appeared at night, that my shame and confusion cured me of procrastinating my business for the remainder of my life.—The Kembles. By Percy Fitzgerald.

Nothing to Eat for Sixteen Months!

A case which has baffled several doctors has just come to light near Preston. In the fold of Ennell-lane, which adjoins Walton-le-Dale, there is a cottage wherein for three years a young woman has been lying bedfast, and for between one and two years has had nothing to eat. Her name is Ann Riding; she is 33 years of age, and resides with her aunt. She was once a strong, healthy woman, never losing a day's work, and was employed as an operative at the mill of Messrs. Horrockses Miller & Co., Preston. Several doctors have attended her, but have not been able to give her any substantial relief; and six months ago remedial operations were abandoned, and the case left to itself—the idea of the aunt being that the "Almighty had to do with it," and that it was useless continuing to incur expense for medicines without any hope of a cure. For sixteen months the young woman had had no food at all; has only occasionally taken a drop of water during that period, and latterly has had nothing whatever to eat or drink—the only thing which she could bear being a drop of water with which to moisten her lips. She is conscious, but very weak; she gets little sleep, and cannot bear a lighted candle in the room at night time. It is supposed that she is suffering from abdominal atrophy, but the exact nature of the case is not positively understood.

Superstition in India.

The last sensation at Jabalpur is the appearance of a devouring demon in the person of a goshaen, who is said to have the proclivity of visiting as a cat every woman he can get at. One hundred and thirty native women are believed by the "people" to have already died from the demon's visitation, and the surviving ladies of the native community have resolved to make immediate offerings, and thereby propitiate their gods to arrest the monster and save them. It is worthy of note that in every such instance money offerings are to be made ere the evil can be averted, so the Government should interest themselves to discover where all the money goes. The goshaen (whom nobody seems to have seen, but everybody has heard of) is said to have made his appearance in this way. A "sahib" and "mem" were digging at some place on the road between Seoni and Jabalpur, when they came on a box, on unlocking which out jumped a child, who, in a miraculously short time, developed himself into the monster. Education, as we understand the term, though half a century pursued over this part of the country by our Government, seems to have conferred little or no practical benefit on the people, when they can be made to credit such an absurd story, got up no doubt by some designing scoundrel in want of money.—Delhi Gazette.

A Clergyman of the Old School.

One of the oldest of the old school of clergymen was the Rev. William Leslie, laird of Bainazeth, and minister of St. Andrews, Lhanbryde. He received his weekly newspaper one Sunday morning just as he was leaving the manse for his duties in church. While the precentor was singing, Mr. Leslie was busy with his newspaper; and when the precentor ceased, he said, "Just sing another verse, John, till I have finished this paragraph." During the discourse, he gave the news of a recent battle, so that his procedure at the commencement of the service was more readily excused. On another occasion, Mr. Leslie remarked, during his discourse, "You must excuse me, brethren, not entering so fully into the subject to-day, since I have an appointment to dine at Ardivit." He referred to the country seat of an hospitable landowner in the vicinity. Mr. Leslie was celebrated for the readiness with which he granted certificates, and for the eccentric manner in which these were written. Here is one: "To all His Majesty's loyal subjects who can feel for a fellow sinner in distress, I beg to certify that the bearer, William Jack, is a son of my old bellman's, a man well known in this neighborhood for his honest poverty and his excessive indolence. The bearer, William Jack, has fallen heir to all his father's poverty, and a double share of his improvidence. I cannot say that the bearer, William Jack, has many active virtues to boast of, but he has not been altogether unmindful of Scriptural injunctions, and has labored with no small success to replenish the earth, although he has done but little to subdue the same. 'Twas his misfortune to lose a cow, by too little care and too much bere chaff; likewise that walking skeleton, which he calls his horse, having ceased to hear the oppressor's voice, or to dread the tyrant's rod, now the poor man has nothing to look to but the skins of the defunct, and the generosity of a benevolent public, by whom he hopes to be stimulated, through these testimonials, with receipt. WILLIAM LESLIE. Lhanbryde Glebe, 1829."

Bottling Sunbeams.

The man with the bottled sunbeams has just set out for England. He comes from Saintes, and means to avoid Paris by making the sea voyage from La Rochelle. His name is Xamben de Prades, and he undertakes to fix the sun's rays—to shut them up, in short—so as to render them serviceable when required for use, exactly like pickles, and preserves, and cherry brandy. The experiment made by M. Xamben consists in taking an oblong vase of metal, and after exposing it for a quarter of an hour to the intense heat of the sun, then closing the aperture by means of a cork, through which a small hole has been pierced. To this hole he applies a powerful lens, by which the solar rays contained in the vase are made to converge towards a taper placed at the distance of a yard from the operator. In less than three minutes' time the taper, with a crackling sound, bursts into flame. We understand that M. Xamben is coming to exhibit the apparatus before the Royal Society of London.

Excavation of the Bed of the Tiber.

The scheme of a thorough excavation of the bed of the Tiber has been taken up by an Italian association, at the head of which is the well-known Signor Alessandro Castellani, but which relies on the coöperation of many artists, antiquaries, and other learned men of Europe and America, all of whom have been strongly urging the speedy commencement of an undertaking which has already been too long delayed. Those who act about it expect no other return for their trouble and expense than the immense gain sure to accrue from it to art and history—to archaeological knowledge in all its branches.

A Lady's Age.

A female school teacher at Ballachulish, in the county of Inverness, Scotland, has been fined £1 for making a false return of her age to the census enumerator. She returned herself as 20, but it was proved she was baptized 44 years ago. The Sheriff who ascertained the facts and instituted the prosecution, has been denounced as a most ungallant man, and several of his lady acquaintances have, upon meeting him, given him the cut direct.

— Mr. George S. Boyle is of the opinion that if we do not stop ridiculing people he shall stop reading this paper. We are of the opinion that if he do not stop reading this paper he will see himself ridiculed. We have it in mind to make of him a spectacle so conspicuously absurd that he will himself perish with laughter.

— Joachim Grist, who lives near the village of Chicago, and has probably had the advantage of its moral atmosphere, has punished his wife by spilling hot coffee into her stomach, until she died. Chicken-hearted people, of weak nerves, who cannot abide the sight of blood, are sometimes driven to very awkward expedients.

HUMOROUS SKETCHES

Of the War in Amador.

[We have received from Mr. John Steinberger, since the Amador War has ended, humorous sketches thereof, which we present with additional pleasure, seeing that the termination of the difficulty without bloodshed is a subject of congratulation as benefitting the best interests of the State.]

Our citizen soldiers muster on New Montgomery street; Emperor Norton at his post majestically surveying the movements of the troops. Sensational Reporters rushing about wild with excitement at the prospects of a glorious item.

The miners armed with their picks and shovels prevent the mines from being pumped out. The Superintendent surveys the scene with looks of dismay.

Governor Haight attempts to settle the differences in a forcible speech; the foreign element at the mines listen open-mouthed, not understanding a word that is said; the others treat his Excellency with the most profound respect and attention.

The General leads his army through Sutter Town, after a glorious but bloodless victory. The miners survive the encounter with looks of calm content.

Beautiful Child.

Beautiful child by thy mother's knee,
In the mystic future what wilt thou be?
A demon of sin or an angel sublime—
A poison Upas or innocent Thyme—
A spirit of evil, flashing down—
With the lurid light of a fiery crown—
Or gliding up with a shining track,
Like the morning star that ne'er looks back.
Daintiest dreamer that ever smiled,
Which wilt thou be my beautiful child?
Beautiful child in my garden bowers,
Friend of the butterflies, birds and flowers,
Pure are the sparkling crystalline stream,
Jewels of truth in thy fairy eyes beam;
Was there ever a whiter soul than thine
Worshiped by Love in a mortal shrine?
My heart thou hast gladdened for two sweet years,
With rainbows of hope through mists of tears
Mists beyond which thy sunny smile
With its halo of glory beams all the while.
Beautiful child, to thy look is given
A gleam serene, not of earth but of heaven,
With thy tell-tale eyes and prattling tongue
Would thou couldst ever thus be young.
Like the beautiful strains of the mockingbird,
From stair to hall thy voice is heard.
How oft in the garden nooks thou'rt found
With flowers thy curly head around!
And kneeling beside me with figure so quaint,
Oh! who would not dote on my infant saint!
Beautiful child, what thy fate shall be
Perchance is wisely hidden from me,
A fallen star thou mayest leave my side,
And of sorrow and shame become the bride—
Shivering, quivering through the cold street,
With a curse behind and before thy feet—
Ashamed to live and afraid to die;
No home, no friend, and a pitiless sky,
Merciful Father, my brain grows wild;
Oh, keep from evil my beautiful child.
Beautiful child, mayst thou soar above,
A warbling cherub of joy and love,
A drop on Eternity's mighty sea,
A blossom on Life's immortal tree—
Floating, flowering evermore
In the blessed light of the golden shore;
And as I gaze on thy sinless bloom
And thy radiant face they dispel my gloom:
I feel he will keep thee undefiled,
And his love protect my beautiful child.

The Religion of Dickens.

The writer of these pages begs to say here most respectfully and emphatically, that he will not feel himself bound in future to answer to any inquiries, from however well-meaning correspondents, as to whether Charles Dickens was an "Unbeliever," or a "Unitarian," or an "Episcopalian," or "whether he ever went to church in his life," or "used improper language," or "drank enough to hurt him." He was human, very human, but he was no scoffer or doubter. His religion was of the heart, and his faith beyond questioning. He taught the world, said Dean Stanley over his new-made grave in Westminster Abbey, great lessons of "the eternal value of generosity, of purity, of kindness, and of unselfishness," and by his fruits he shall be known of all men. Let me commend to the attention of my numerous nameless correspondents, who have attempted to soil the moral character of Dickens, the following little incident, related to me by himself, during a summer evening walk among the Kentish meadows, a few months before he died. I will try to tell the story, if possible, as simply and naturally as he told it to me. "I chanced to be traveling some years ago," he said, "in a railroad carriage between Liverpool and London. Besides myself there were two ladies and a gentleman occupying the carriage. We happened to be all strangers to each other, but I noticed at once that a clergyman was of the party. I was occupied with a ponderous article in the Times, when the sound of my own name drew my attention to the fact that a conversation was going forward among the three other persons in the carriage with reference to myself and my books. One of the ladies was perusing "Bleak House," then lately published, and the clergyman had commenced a conversation with the ladies by asking what book they were reading. On being told the author's name and the title of the book, he expressed himself greatly grieved that any lady in England should be willing to take up the writings of so vile a character as Charles Dickens. Both the ladies showed great surprise at the low estimate the clergyman put upon an author whom they had been accustomed to read, to say the least, with a certain degree of pleasure. They were evidently much shocked at what the man said of the immoral tendency of these books, which they seemed never before to have suspected. Presently I joined in the conversation and made myself known to the clergyman, but as we were nearing the station in London, I was spared a long interview with my truthful companion; but if I were to live a hundred years I should not forget the abject condition into which the narrator of my crimes was instantly plunged. His face turned white as his cravat, and his lips refused to utter words. He seemed like a wilted vegetable, and as if his legs belonged to somebody else. The ladies became aware of the situation at once, and bidding them "good-day," I stepped smilingly out of the carriage. Before I could get away from the station the man had mustered up strength sufficient to follow me, and his apologies were so nauseous and craven that I pitied him from my soul. I left him with this caution: Before you make charges against the character of any man again, about whom you know nothing, and of whose works you are utterly ignorant, study to be a seeker after truth, and avoid lying as you would eternal perdition.—Mr. Fields in the Atlantic.

A Political Watering-Place.

Our first acquaintance with Long Branch was made through an engraving in one of our illustrated contemporaries, and certainly our eyes have seldom rested on a more important and attractive scene than the beach as there depicted. A long reach of sand, bounded on one side by the cliffs, scented here and there by commodious stairways, and on the other by the ocean, which broke on it in three ranks of well-drilled "combers," was covered by a crowd of persons of all ages and both sexes, dressed in the height of fashion. Their clothes were of various cuts, but there was none of it which was not costly. We were struck, too, by the tallness of the women, and the extreme richness of their clothing, but not nearly so much so as by the behavior of the children. Every little girl was well-dressed, and was playing with a little boy, also well-dressed, at some game peculiarly adapted to the seaside, and every gentleman and there were not many—was in such positions on one or more ladies. The ocean does not behave as we were led to expect. It frets, and foams, and roars, but it does it irregularly and spasmodically, and often viciously. The breakers in the picture must have been exhibited only once, for the artist's special benefit. The "cliff," too, is disappointing to a reader of illustrated journals. Instead of being a hundred feet high, it is only about fifteen. Instead of being composed of savage rocks, it consists of red Jersey gravel, which the rains wash down, and the ocean year by year eats away. You may go down it by the ladder, but, if active and eager, you can jump down, and the boys occasionally descend on what Frenchmen call their "seant,"—a useful and proper term, for which there is no English equivalent. In all other watering-places with which we are acquainted, the New York element is diluted by a dash of Boston, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or some other city. At Long Branch it is pure. Not that Long Branch, by any means, gives one an idea of what is best in New York life, but it gives us a side of New York life with which no other city has anything to compare, and gives it in a state of extraordinary condensation. It has become within three or four years the chosen resort of a class which rules New York politically, which is found nowhere but in New York, and which discovers few or no points of contact with the inhabitants of any other place. It is a class, too, which in any other "summer resort" would be tolerably uncomfortable, but which in going to Long Branch carries its power and privilege and dignity and standards of morals and manners with it. If one wants to know in what lies the ability by which the political class in New York raise themselves above the rank of common thieves and pimps, and makes their protracted existence possible even in a community of the lowest morals, he cannot consider himself well-informed on that point without going down on one of the boats which now connect the place with the city. He will there see that their claim on the forbearance of society lies in their remarkable skill in transportation. The Company which owns the boats is a concern absolutely without credit. Few persons would take one of its shares as a gift, much less as it have goods on credit. President Fisk holds the first place in influence and distinction. His team of six horses, and his gorgeous coach filled with frail beauties, carefully selected, are perhaps the most prominent objects on the promenade on fine afternoons. To the outside world he is a Jeremy Diddler of luxurious habits, but to the Long Branch world, and, above all, to the local salottelle—the great army of cooks, waiters, coachmen, expressmen, brakemen, chambermaids—he is "Colonel Fisk," a gentleman of "fine talents and dignified manners," who spends his money like a prince. We have wondered, on seeing the country people who came up on the excursion crowding into the hotel, their children clinging to their hands, to get a peep into the great man's suite of apartments, or collected in groups to stare at him on the afternoons, as he strolls along the shore leading a lady of the half-world by the hand, what sort of notion the young people would carry back to the farmhouses of the great problem of success in life, and of the ends of striving, in this busy American world. It is, after all, however, the selection of Long Branch as a summer retreat by President Grant, and not its selection by the city gamblers and politicians, which has of late given it most of its fame in the rest of the Union; but it must be said for him that he contributes nothing to the brilliancy of its seasons. The plateau on which his cottage stands is cut off by a creek or inlet from that on which the hotels stand and the visitors swarm. The lesson of the great gold panic of two years ago has apparently not been lost on him, for though the audacity of the Narragansett S. S. Co. was suspect, only little of its company. But Black Careless behind him in his light wagon, nevertheless, for he seldom closes his avenue gate without seeing half-a-dozen office-seekers' backs batted to some portion of his premises, and half-a-dozen gentlemen waiting in his piazza, to let him know what disposition should be made of that Hoboken telegraphship or Oshkosh post-office, if he means to save the country and the party from going to the dogs. New York Nation.

—An ex-Confederate soldier having been appointed to a clerkship at Washington, the Grand Army of the Republic, which is not a political organization, has enacted a coming out fit of bewildering eccentricity. If there is anything we admire more than a whisky-punch, with a bit of pineapple in it, it is generosity to a fallen foe. Naturally we are wlad with delight over the patriotism that manifests itself in proscription. We do not claim that ex-confederate soldiers are entitled to clerkships; we only maintain that a man who has whipped his enemy like a bull-dog ought to be ashamed to hunt him down like a hound.

Hannah Binding Shoes.

Poor lone Hannah,
Sitting at the window, binding shoes. Mid May is passing;
Faded, wrinkled,      The apple boughs a pigeon coos.
Sitting, stitching, in a mournful muse. Hannah shudders,
Bright-eyed beauty once was she,      For the mild south-wester mischief brews.
When the bloom was on the tree:      Round the rocks of her Marblehead,
Spring and winter,      Outward bound, a schooner sped:
Hannah's at the window, binding shoes.      Silent, lonesome,
Not a neighbor      Hannah's at the window, binding shoes.
Passing nod or answer will refuse      'Tis November.
To her whisper,      Now no tear her wasted cheek bedews.
"Is there from the fishers any news?"      From Newfoundland
Oh, her heart's adrift, with one      Not a sail returning will she lose.
On an endless voyage gone!      Whispering hoarsely, "Fisherman, Night and morning,      Have you, have you heard of Ben?"
Hannah's at the window, binding shoes.      Old with watching,
Fair young Hannah,      Hannah's at the window, binding shoes.
Ben, the sun-burnt fisher, gaily woos:      Twenty winters
Hale and clever,      Bleach and tear the ragged shores she views
For a willing heart and hand he sues.      Twenty seasons:—
May-day skies are all aglow,      Never one has brought her any news.
And the waves are laughing so!      Still her dim eyes silently
For her wedding      Chase the white sails o'er the sea:
Hannah leaves her window and her shoes.      Hopeless, faithful,
—Every Saturday.      Hannah's at the window, binding shoes.
—Lucy Larcom.

The Hotel Clerk.

Mr. W. D. Howells photographs the American hotel clerk, in "Their Wedding Journey," as follows: "It was with a sudden sinking of the heart that Basil beheld, presiding over the register, the conventional American hotel clerk. He was young; he had a neat mustache and well-brushed hair; jeweled studs sparkled in his shirt-front, and rings on his white hands; a gentle disdain of the traveling public breathed from his person in the mystical odors of Ihlang-ihlang. He did not lift his haughty head to look at the wayfarer who meekly wrote his name in the register; he did not answer him when he begged for a cool room; he turned to the board on which the keys hung, and, plucking one from it, slid it toward Basil on the marble counter, touched a bell for a call-boy, whistled a bar of Offenbach, and, as he wrote the number of the room against Basil's name, said to a friend lounging near him, as if resembling a conversation, 'Well, she's a mighty pooty gal, any way, Chawley!' When I reflected that this was a type of the hotel clerk throughout the United States, that behind unnumbered registers at this moment he is snubbing travelers into the dust, and that they are suffering and perpetuating him, I am lost in wonder at the national meekness. Not that I am one to refuse the humble pie his jeweled fingers offer me. 'Abjectly I take my key, and creep off up-stairs after the call-boy, and try to give myself the genteel air of one who has not been stepped upon. But I think homicidal things, all the same, and I rejoice that, in the safety of print, I can cry out against the despot whom I have not the presence to defy.' 'You vulgar and cruel little soul,' I say, and I imagine myself breathing the words to his teeth, 'why do you treat a weary stranger with this ignominy? I am to pay well for all I get, and I shall not complain of that. But look at me, and own my humanity; confess, by some civil action, by some decent phrase, that I have rights, and that they shall be respected. Answer my proper questions; respond to my fair demands. Do not slide my key at me; do not deny me the poor politeness of a nod as you give it in my hand. I am not your equal; few men are; but I shall not presume upon your clemency. Come, I also am human.' "Our writers seem to be making a simultaneous assault on this insolent class, for Ralph Keeler, who is traveling in the South, cauterizes the clerk of a Mississippi steamer in this wise: "Then at the office we must confront that terrible autocrat, the chief clerk, who is, perhaps, a little better than the average wretch of the great hotel clerk the world over. He assigns us a room with a tone of outraged dignity in his voice, and we wither gradually out of his sight to deposit our valises on our beds and lock them in, lest that awful fellow should take it into his head to throw them overboard."—Appletons' Journal.

— It is to be wished that the sweet-tempered gentlemen composing the Board of Education might be given a good, square salary, so that being fairly paid for their services they would have no excuse for enacting the blackguard. As matters now stand there is no feeling of responsibility; being paid nothing, a School Director naturally feels that nothing is expected of him. It is too much to expect of a man that he shall be a gentleman for nothing a month and find himself. If a leopard is required to make a re-distribution of his spots, or an Ethiop to take upon himself an alien hue, the compensation must be in proportion to the favor asked. Even a tadpole is justified in retaining his tail until he shall perceive the advantage of becoming a frog.

A Sad Case.

We have before us a periodical monthly entitled The Living Way, published in this city by the Missionary Christian Union, whatever that may be, and edited by S. D. Simonds, wherever he may be. We have the misfortune to regard Simonds as a heretic. We think this, first, because his language is so hopelessly incoherent that it expresses not one idea that is intelligible to a free man. The relation, when he is read as a Murchie hero, or we are a dumb beast. We cannot admit that woman is dishonored, it would be disrespectful to our admirers. We will make room for a sermon extract. "The universal Intuitions are the basis of science, government and religion. These are but the expressions of its ideas." We are left, as it is to what this refers to; probably to "Intuitions," the idea of an Intuition must be a peculiar Artistic, and, alas, I repeat, more or less correct. These expressions should be followed by a discussion of the forms of all religions, demonstrating for their different degrees of power in the world by showing how much they embody correctly from Intuition. And it should be shown that all changes in the forms of religion, the power of progress in the science of government, arise from an effort to embody the universal Intuitions. This would account for a hundred of manifestations, whether true or false." We beg Mr. Simonds' pardon; it would hardly account for the manifestation of material reality with which his own existence has favored us. Nothing short of a theory of creative depravity could ever satisfactorily explain that Mr. Simonds' Seminary we admit that the question in question has a bee in his bonnet, because of the extraordinary trouble he takes to exhibit his entire Seminary as a symptom very peculiarly present. We do not agree with him that the Scriptures furnish "many" more examples than we can find; they have been called mad. Nay more, they furnish many more examples than we can find; they really were so, but from his view that these facts are any evidence that madness is not mad, we crave leave to dissent. Because Jesus Christ, Paul, Saul and Ezekiel were accounted mad, it does not logically follow that Simonds' is of sound mind, health. We set out to review Mr. Simonds' magazine, but have found himself so much the more attractive subject that we fear we have been insensibly led into personality—for which fault we humbly beg to be forgiven. If Mr. Simonds will kindly answer this question, without expectation or obscenity, it will go far toward settling his sanity of mind. Admitting that universal Intuition is the base of science, religion and government, how does it happen that the soul-power of the Indinite is so closely allied to the perceptivity of separate spirit-essences as to exert upon them a reciprocal mind-force, and cause the tail of a blue pig to become a comely spirit?

British Columbia.

We hear but little of British Columbia, and the Report of 1870 by the Acting Colonial Secretary, Mr. Good, on the condition of the colony is acceptable. He states that the coal of gold in 1869 was quite preponderant to the mining population. The quantity known to be extracted was of the value of $2,417,874, to which must be added about a million for gold shipped by private means, gold sent out from Kootenay and the southern boundary, and gold remaining in the country; making a total of $3,417,873. The area of the known gold fields has been considerably extended, and now reaches from the 100 to the 130th meridian of west longitude, extending over a half of from 100 to 200 miles wide. In 1869 the first quartz mill was erected at Cariboo, chiefly with the view of enabling discoverers of gold to test the value of the rock. The Acting Secretary is of opinion that a well-timed law opening the direction for turning to enormous profits the capital but this one has not yet arrived for British Columbia, and the development of the country hangs almost with every falling step. The yield of the Cariboo and mines in 1869 was about 40,833 tons. The influence of Queen Charlotte's Island is equal to the Pennsylvania for timber purposes, but properly to develop and work the mine would require an outlay of £10,000. The export of spars and timber reached a value of $250,885 in 1869. The productions of the colony have to find a vast market in the only neighboring market, where the coal of the English Bay and the lumber of Puget Sound enter San Francisco free of duty. On consideration with the Dominion of Canada, one of the first subjects of attention must be reciprocity; another must be steady communication with Canada by wagon road, open all the year through, and then by railroad. Without this, communication would exist only a name. There were in 1869, 23,765 cattle in the colony, and 11,846 sheep. The grass of the country is admirably adapted for fattening cattle. Wheat and other cereals ripen readily, and mature seldom less than 40 bushels to the acre. Reputable prices are obtained both for the grain and for the wool manufactured there in the colony. The population, as estimated from the most reliable returns, is stated at 15,100, exclusive of natives. 1,947 are Chinese, but many mining miners, traders, and fishermen are overlooked. The Indian population is variously estimated at from 50,000 to 55,000. The Acting Secretary maintains that the colony only requires opening up, and a fair chance of securing population and capital, to become highly wealthy and prosperous.

— Professor Fowler, the famous temperament-sharp and bump-feeler, is coming to California. We presume he intends writing a treatise upon the organ of self-esteem, and wishes to study it in its native wild.

Practical Philosophy of Gas-Burning.

If any one is inclined to look contemptuously on so small a matter as the improvement of gas-burners, a few of the facts stated in the Report will, if we have any of the Englishman's regard for his pocket, very decidedly convert him to a sense of its importance. On an average, consumers of gas, by using well-constructed and well-adapted burners, instead of the usual clumsy, hap-hazard kind, may reduce their gas bills by one-third or one-half of the whole amount, while obtaining a stronger and more steady light than they obtained before.

A good gas-burner is not an imaginary article, although a perfect burner has yet to be discovered. The Referees in their recent inquiries and experiments made by order of the British Board of Trade have taken as a standard "Sugg's London Argand Burner No. 1," which is not the best invented by the maker, but seems at present the one most adapted for practical use. Comparing with this burner, when burning five feet of gas per hour, those in common use under the names of "fish-tail" and "batwing" burners, we obtain some remarkable results. Taking the standard burner's illuminating power at 100, six fish-tail burners gave these results: 73, 62, 52, 47, 36, and 19, the latter giving less than one-fifth of the light supplied by the standard at the same consumption of gas. The batwing burners show better results, being 86 and 82, as compared with the standard. It must be observed, however, that the standard is an Argand burner, in which the supply of air to the flame is regulated by a chimney. Comparing three other Argands with the standard, we find the illuminating power still far inferior, being no more than 78, 77, and 34 per cent. respectively. These tests clearly prove the superiority of Sugg's Argand No. 1 to any burner in common use. Of course it remains a question in particular instances whether the cost of supplying these burners would be too great to admit of their general adoption.

It is now conclusively established that the quantity of gas does not influence the development of light that the difference perceived in the illuminating power afforded by the consumption of different quantities of the same gas is due to the difference of the burners, each burner "doing justice" to the gas at a particular rate of consumption, and declining in illuminating power when the supply falls short of this rate or exceeds it. It has been proved also that the temperature at which the gas is supplied to the burner makes no practical difference in the light, that an over-supply of air to the flame and an excess of pressure in the supply-pipe are adverse to illuminating power. Gas, it appears, is in the fittest state to be burned, and to give out its maximum of light, when it streams through the burner under little or no pressure, flowing upwards like a natural flame. The practical suggestion deducible from these conclusions is, that the burners should be improved; and we have called attention to the best type yet brought into use.—London Spectator.

Singular Use for a Galvanic Battery.

Many years ago, Major Stone of the 15th Hussars, then stationed in India, had a gold watch and chain stolen from his drawing-room table. Collecting all the native servants of whom he had any suspicion together, and making them join hands, he told them that presently his God would give them a shock which would however be harmless to all but the culprit; but that if he were among them he would in about an hour turn green and silently die. The black fellows grinned incredulously, when the wires of a very powerful battery, prepared and concealed below the table, were brought in contact with the two end men. So severe was the shock that three of them fell to the ground. The Major then remarked, that if the guilty one came to him within half an hour he could apply an antidote which would save his life. The effect of the shock upon the imagination of the superstitious thief was so great as to induce belief in the prospect of turning green and dying, and he shortly came, watch and chain in hand, to beg for mercy and the antidote. Recently a similar attempt has been made in India with a fatal result. We hear that in a heavy case of theft that lately occurred in the city of Nagpore, a "peeler," scientifically inclined, applied a galvanic battery to a woman supposed to be concerned in the case, in the hopes that the fright would make her divulge her accomplices. The shock gave the woman such a fright that, in the words of our informant, "she thought the devil had got possession of her," and as soon as she escaped out of the hands of the police the unfortunate woman committed suicide by taking poison. Before she died her deposition was taken down, and her friends have now instituted a criminal prosecution against the police.

The Mont Cenis Tunnel.

A letter from Modane, in the Salut Public, says:—"I have just visited the tunnel of the Alps, in company with a director of the works, and can give you some exact information. The whole work is now open, and by next week at latest a locomotive will traverse the entire passage. The ventilation is excellent, and the current of air perceptibly felt; in fact the heat was so moderate that a great coat was not to be disdained. All the Swiss stories about heat intense enough to produce asphyxia are pure invention. A pump continues to work to aid in expelling the smoke, but the compressors which produced respirable air during the boring are being removed. The administration would not have failed to preserve them if it had felt the smallest uneasiness about the ventilation of the passage."

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

[Report for the Week ending September 30th, 1871.]

— Imports during the current month have been of considerable magnitude, more particularly that of foreign Coals, in the aggregate upward of 30,000 tons. We are in receipt of quite a fleet of foreign vessels with assorted merchandise, from England, France, Germany, China, Japan, etc. The New York fleet, making long passages for the season, several ships are now overdue, the merchandise thereon being greatly needed for our fall trade. It is a notable fact, that notwithstanding the large number of arrivals from sea with general merchandize, our stocks, both in bonded and free warehouses, are unusually small; and all this with a constant stream flowing in upon us from the Atlantic by the transcontinental railroad. We are quite confident that it will be found, at the end of the year, that our stocks of Coffee, Sugar, Rice—in fact, most, if not all, important staples, both foreign and domestic—will be short, as compared with many previous winters. The opening up of the continental railway is doing much to people the plains and valleys, and these are compelled to draw their supplies to a very considerable extent from this coast. Prosperity is everywhere the rule rather than the exception. The present drawback is our inability to furnish outward cargoes for the large fleet of ships now at anchor in this harbor. We regret to add that freights are scarce, and rates for grain to Liverpool lower than ever before known. Commercial and Financial Herald

— Imports of Teas from January 1st to September 14th: China, 535,104 lbs, 9,221 pkgs; Japan, 1,615,527 lbs, 13,876 pkgs. The local and interior demand is active for the season. Orders are constantly reaching us from New York and other Eastern cities, in response to Muster chests there exhibited—the Teas delivered wherever directed by telegram. This phase of the business promises to be quite popular, and is rapidly extending in favor, our importers and jobbers beginning to realize its advantages. Our supply of new crop Oolongs, including Comet and other fine qualities, is being constantly added to by every arrival from China, and the same remarks are applicable to those from Japan. The New York Bulletin, in alluding to the "new departure" in this trade, giving some statistics of this year's business, says: "The imports by way of the Suez Canal have not been altogether satisfactory to the New York merchants, and importations in sailing vessels by way of Cape Horn are nearly at an end. The complaints relative to the New York Custom House in the delay of goods, and the charges in getting them through with dispatch, amount to nearly five per cent. on the value of the invoice, has operated largely in favor of overland transportation, and New York will shortly draw its supplies from San Francisco. Moreover it would seem that New York is destined, for the future, to supply the European markets, as European merchants can obtain their orders much quicker from New York than by direct importation from China."

— This year's vintage continues to be exceedingly promising. In Los Angeles County, where the grape crop is larger than in any other county excepting Sonoma, the vintage is being gathered. The Star says, concerning the grape crop: "Most of the vineyards are under contract, and we believe the prices obtained are considered satisfactory. We hear that a cent per pound is the prevailing rate, which is an advance on last year's prices, which averaged  $\frac{3}{4}$  c. We have been informed that an agent is purchasing extensively for Mr. Curtis, who intends to make brandy in the Gavett distillery, on the bank of the river. The crop is fully an average one, though not as large as was anticipated during the flowering season. It is said the grapes are unequal, a large portion not having filled out to the usual size. However, as there is always something to be rated as a drawback, we have confidence that the vintage will be a successful one, both as to quantity and quality." The demand for Buena Vista and other first-class native wines is continued, with sales 5,000 galls white for shipment East. The success attending the manufacture of sparkling wines in this city, by I. Landsberger & Co., is encouraging, selling as fast as made at \$13@14 for muscatelle; private cavée, \$11.50@21.50; ordinary sparkling, \$10@11  $\frac{1}{2}$  doz. French claret in casks, and favorite brands of champagne, continue to find buyers at fair prices. Commercial Herald.

— Imports of Coffee from January 1st to September 14th: Rio, lbs 937,360; Java, lbs 311,830; Manila, lbs 442,786; Hawaiian, lbs 81,780; Central America, lbs 8,691,920, pkgs 1,490; Tahitian, lbs 13,418; San Domingo, lbs 2,700; Mocha, lbs 1,750. Imports include 800 bags Java or Uraue; this is sold at 25c. Other parcels of this description continue to reach us by rail and via Panama from New York and Boston, selling, for the most part, at 24c. The last lot, 3,400 bags, Central American Green sent by rail to St. Louis was charged 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  c  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb freight—the rate now advanced to 12 $\frac{1}{2}$  c. We note sales of 1,000 bags Guatemala, in lots, at 16 $\frac{1}{2}$  c; prime Costa Rica, 17c. We quote Rio and Manilla at 16c  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. At the close, 600 bags C A is sold private.

— Imports of Sugar from January 1st to Sept. 14th: Eastern, bbls 10; Manila, lbs 1,479,020; Hawaiian, lbs 8,800,016, pkgs 18,286; Peruvian, lbs 7,007,927; pkgs 29,292; Batavian, lbs 7,820,527; Central American, lbs 1,874,473, pkgs 790; China, lbs 1,522,527, pkgs 11,753; Mexican, lbs 678,924; Tahitian, lbs 16,631, pkgs 64. Imports include the Uraue's cargo from Java—say 1,971 baskets, weighing a million pounds. At auction, an invoice of Central American, say 641 sacks. The market for Hawaiian and other raws is but poorly supplied, stocks outside the refineries being unusually light for the season.

Where Hast Thou Gleaned?

Out of the countless sheets East and from Europe desirous of exchanging with the News Letter, we call the following beautiful lines from the American Wesleyan, whose motto is, "Whatsoever things are true, just, pure and lovely, of a good report: if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think of these things." Of course, if the American Wesleyan will issue any paper furthering any one of these things, we are heartily with them now and forever:

Where hast thou gleaned, O gleaner?

Thy brow is flushed with heat,

And thou art late returning;—

There's dew upon thy feet.

The nightingale is singing;

The star of evening burns;

And homeward from the meadow

The bee, belated, turns.

Where hast thou gleaned, O gleaner?

A smile is on thy mouth—

Thy garments bring the odors

Of spices of the south;

And, lo! a spray of roses

That to thy skirt hath clung;—

And long before I saw thee,

I heard the song you sung.

Where hast thou gleaned, O gleaner?

Thou bearest the marks of toil,

And from the clutch of labor

Thou bringest ample spoil.

Happy art thou, who bringest

Thy sheaf at set of sun;

Who thus, with songs and gladness,

Returns, when work is done.

Where hast thou gleaned, O gleaner?

Where reapers went before?

Where careful binders gathered

The Master's harvest store?

Or hast thou slowly followed

The heavy-laden wain?

And from the dusty highway

Gathered the scattered grain?

Where wilt thou glean, O gleaner!

Where'er the seed was sown—

If in the field or wayside,

Wherever it hath grown,

Some that the storm hath broken,

Some, mayhap, undetred,

Thy careful hand may gather

And garner for thy God.

Queen Victoria's Income.

Very erroneous statements as to the personal wealth and income of the Queen of England are constantly published in American papers. Many people even in England believe that the Crown Income by the Civil List Act, which is £385,000, is voted for her own use and behoof, and that she is quite at liberty to, in American phraseology, do "what she darn pleases" with this. This a little investigation will show is not the case; for a schedule is affixed to the Act in which the £385,000 is distinctly appropriated in the following manner: Her Majesty's Privy Purse, £60,000; salaries of her Majesty's household, and retired allowances, £131,260; expenses of her Majesty's household, £172,500; Royal bounty, alms, and special services, £13,200; unappropriated balances, £8,040. Total, £385,000. Some years after the accession of the Queen, however, the Privy Purse was increased from £60,000 a year, at which it was fixed by the Civil List Committee and the Civil List Act, to £160,000 a year, by moneys withdrawn from the other classes, the total allowance remaining the same, viz: £385,000 per annum, and this involving no greater expenditure of public moneys. It is asserted, that out of the Privy Purse allowance the Queen has saved about four millions sterling, and this is quite probable. This at 3 per cent. would yield £120,000 per annum—four times as much as would have paid the pensions granted by the Parliament to the Royal Princesses from first to last, and would have spared the country up to the present time £200,000 in those pensions alone; and thereat John Bull growleth. It has taken Queen Victoria thirty-five years to save her four millions out of her Privy Purse allowance of from £60,000 to £160,000 per annum.

— We have it by telegraph that Mr. Vincent Collyer—than whom the devil has not a more useful servant nor President Grant an abler master—has arrived at Camp Grant, Arizona, and has forbidden any white man to approach that post nearer than ten miles. A party of miners, perishing of thirst, were kept at bay with cannon. Camp Grant is a sort of "Reservation"—a "city of refuge" to which all murdering savages in danger of military punishment incontinently betake themselves, and are protected and cherished by Government officials, then recruited, equipped and permitted to again take the war path against the defenceless whites. Some months ago a party of settlers, stung to madness by this criminal nonsense, made an incursion into the "Reservation" and massacred a few dozens of these vipers whom the Government was quickening in its bosom. The presence of Vincent Collyer is the retributive result. Great Scott! is there no one to take this villain by the neck and choke him in the interest of Christian civilization? Must he be permitted to go about clothed with authority to turn United States artillery upon citizens of the United States for the benefit of a syndicate of Indian Agents, whose most honest act would kindle a blush upon the cheek of a thief? Gad! it makes one mourn the decay of the homely virtue of assassination.

Book Notices.

GINX'S BABY—HIS BIRTH AND OTHER MISFORTUNES. (Thirteenth American, from the Eleventh London edition). George Routledge & Sons, N. Y.; Henry Payot & Co., San Francisco.

The present season of literary activity in England—consequent, in some measure, upon the political activity of the continent—has produced three notable satires: The Fight at Dame Europa's School, The Battle of Dorking, and the volume before us. It is impossible to conceive works more radically unlike in conception, intent and execution, and yet they have enjoyed an almost equal, and very exceptional, popularity. The "Fight" was designed to hold up for execration the bad faith, not to say pusillanimity, of Great Britain, in permitting the humiliation of France by the Germans. Anything stupider or more puerile than this celebrated brochure can scarcely be imagined, yet so cleverly timed was it, and so deftly attuned to some subtle chord of public feeling, that its popularity was unbounded. Its success was that of a blundering dullard, who, by the mere seizing of a potent opportunity unregarded by his betters, is lifted into power and place by a wave of popular feeling. The "Battle" is also political in design, and though infinitely superior in point of literary merit to its predecessor, is yet what is termed on this side the Atlantic very dull reading. That is, its effect depends almost wholly upon the novelty of its design—being a narrative of future events—and not at all upon any charm or other quality of style. Like the "Fight," its success was wholly due to its timeliness and adaptation to popular ideas, and like that work it will be as ephemeral as it is "famous." In Ginx's Baby, however, we have something of quite another sort. It is based upon something wider and deeper than mere dissatisfaction with the acts of a government. It is more social than political, and appeals to feelings as permanent as they are universal, by describing, and sharply censuring, follies unhappily quite as universal, and it is to be feared equally permanent. It has likewise the advantage of the screeds with which we have contrasted it, in point of style, in which important respect it is keen, racy and epigrammatic, without the "novelty" that comes of sacrificing sound ideas to brilliant rhetoric. To give even a brief outline of its plot, or a meager specimen of its diction, is no part of our design, and would, in truth, be unjust to the author. Suffice it to say that it is the "short and simple annals" of a child who is the special care, and whose welfare is the pet solicitude, of organized philanthropy. An entire community of Christian people versus each and every ill that a certain young thing is heir to. That is the manner and the matter of it. That the young thing should finally commit suicide to rid it of its benefactors is rather natural under the circumstances. If Ginx's Baby do not obtain a place in permanent literature we miss our guess.

SARCHEDON. By G. J. Whyte Melville. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

This new and brilliant novel, by Major Melville, leads us into fresh fields of romance, and is filled with gorgeous pictures of Oriental life in the days of the Assyrian and Egyptian kings. Semiramis, the great queen; Ninus, the warrior king; Assarac, the ambitious priest, and Sarchedon, the hero, are the principal characters, and the scene is laid in haughty Babylon, in the times of her glory and splendor. The descriptions are fine, the interest of the story sustained, and the many readers of "Holmby House," "The Gladiators" and others of Melville's novels, will read "Sarchedon" with pleasure.

ALMOST FAULTLESS. A Story of the Present Day. By the author of "A Book for Governesses." D. Appleton & Co., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

We have never read "A Book for Governesses," nor from our experience of "Almost Faultless" shall we ever attempt it, nor advise any but our most bitter enemy to peruse a book by this author.

LIGHT SCIENCE FOR LEISURE HOURS. By Richard Proctor, B. A. Camb. F. R. A. S. Published by Appleton & Co., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

The essays in this volume have been selected from the author's contributions to serial literature during the last few years. They present scientific truths in a clear, simple and readable form to the public, and are full of interest to the scientific reader. Some of the headings of chapters give good idea of the work: The Earth a Magnet; A Great Tidal Wave; The Usefulness of Earthquakes; Influence of Marriage on the Death-Rate; The Secret of the North Pole.

Preparations for Cholera.

Active preparations are being made by the Local Authority of Greenock, Scotland, for the reception and treatment of cases of cholera, should that epidemic make its appearance in the Clyde. A list of instructions to pilots, tug masters, and masters of vessels entering the river has been printed and freely circulated, detailing the steps to be taken in regard to vessels on board which cases of diarrhoeal disease, or cholera, or any disease of a suspicious kind, has been observed during the voyage, and laying down rules for giving information to the proper authorities of the same, for the burning of the clothes and bedding of all persons who have died, and for the inspection of the vessel by the medical officer of the Local Authority, etc. The Sanitary Committee have appointed a daily qualified medical officer to board vessels arriving at the Tail of the Bank in which the disease has occurred, and a circular has been issued to the medical gentlemen resident in town asking if they would be willing to give their services in the way of district or casual visitation should the epidemic break out here. Measures are also being taken for the isolation of persons affected with the plague. The reception house in Glebe can be used at any moment, and the erection of a temporary iron hospital in an out-of-the-way part of the burgh is contemplated. The sanitary officers are taking other measures for warding off the pestilence by flushing the streets of the more densely populated parts of the town, and circulating information among the inhabitants as to how they should conduct themselves in the event of a visitation of cholera.

— Two hundred dollars fine for biting a woman on the neck and arms! That is Judge Sawyer's idea of justice! That is the sentence imposed upon the gentle Mr. Hill, because His Eminence set his incisors into the yielding tissue of Mrs. Langdon, a lady with whom his wife happened to be debating by means of a stew-kettle. This is most outrageous, and we call upon somebody to appeal the case. If this monstrous decision stands, the Mail Bag owes the municipality about ten thousand dollars. Though by nature of a mild and gentle appetite, preferring simple roots and herbs, yet it has been his custom to nip all female necks and arms that have been willingly submitted unto his teeth. He hath found in this harmless, and he had supposed lawful, practice, an exceeding sweetness of sensation, and a satisfaction wherewith the delights of sausage, or the bliss of pigs' feet, can in nowise compare. Having commonly found the gratification mutual, he thinks he is justified in maintaining its entire innocence.

— It seems that some days ago a youth named Cavanagh found the cold corpse of an infant buried in a sandhill on Harrison street, and for some time he has been in the habit of visiting the pretty thing, exhuming it, gratifying his love of the beautiful by admiring it, and then reintering it with scrupulous care. The other day it occurred to him that the secret was too good to keep, and he imparted it to some one who basely betrayed his trust by informing the Coroner. Since then the sandhill has lost its attraction to the romantic youngster, and he consumes with a slow fever of poker dice, and breathes out his young soul in Russian cigaritos. Alas, poor boy! he is not long for earth: his physician says he is liable to join the Young Men's Christian Association any day.

Madrigal.

O Dove, that dost bewail thy love
 As I do mine,
 Would that my woe could find the facile flow
 Thou hast for thine!

In every wood I hear thy voice
 In loud lament,
 While I am fain to send the sounds of pain
 To banishment.

Yet I divine thy heart and mine
 Know the same grief,
 But this has utterance, while silent tears
 Are my relief.

Let us divide our burdens, then—
 Mourn thou for me,
 And I, who am too proud to moan aloud,
 Will weep for thee!

—Macmillan's Magazine.—*Alice Horton.Negro Atrocities in Africa.

Additional dispatches received by the R. M. S. Loanda, which has arrived at Liverpool, states that the western districts of the Gold Coast were tranquil; all the paths and roads were open, and that trade and agriculture were being carried on in perfect safety. The native chiefs of the British Protectorate, who had assembled at Cape Coast to meet the Governor for the purpose of assisting him to bring about a peace with the Ashantees, had almost all returned to their own places, and it was considered that peace had actually been concluded between the Fantees and the Ashantees. Mr. Thomas Forson was commissioned by the Governor of Cape Coast to go up to Coomassie to negotiate with the King of Ashantee for the release of the four Europeans who are still held prisoners in the Ashantee capital. A further account states that the remains of the hordes of Ashantees that had been invading the eastern districts of the English Protectorate were returning, bringing with them thousands of captives—chiefly women, girls, and boys—from the neighborhood of the Volta. When the remnant of the great body of the troops which composed the first army of invasion of the eastern provinces entered Coomassie, there was public lamentation on account of the numbers who had fallen in the war; and, according to the fearful custom of the country, there took place horrible human sacrifices in almost every street—"in fact hardly any description," according to an eye-witness, "could exaggerate the reality." At least half the Ashantees who went to battle are reported to have died; and two hundred human jawbones were carried in procession through the streets. All over the Gold Coast there were signs of increasing prosperity, and people were looking forward for better times. Prodigious quantities of produce were wasted for want of roads, and in the western districts of the British Protectorate good roads could be made to the very heart of the oil-producing parts of the country.

— When a young girl is required to unite herself in wedlock with an aged man, she commonly objects, upon the ground that he is old enough to be her father. It is strange how long this frivolous plea has been suffered to pass unquestioned; there is no case on record in which the man ever has become her father, and the danger is purely imaginary. Our advice is—When a young woman claims immunity from present matrimony through fear of an impossible contingency, break her back in a great multitude of places.

— We find the following in all the newspapers: "Omaha papers fish in a cañon with perpendicular walls three thousand feet high." Then these cunning artificers erected the walls themselves, for within a distance from Omaha which a thief would traverse in a night, there is not a natural cañon of sufficient depth to screen an assassin. We have this from a former inhabitant, who speaks knowingly, and apparently from experience.

— A besottedly patriotic exchange grows wildly editorial anent the Indian policy of this Christian Government, and ascribes the beauties and excellences of the same to President Grant. We do not deem it probable that anybody will contend against that Christian gentleman for the barren honor of having fertilized a few paltry thousands of scattered acres with the rich blood of white women and lobster-colored babies.

Total, $533,643.

Telegraphy in Chinese Characters.

Mr. Vignier, the Harbor Master of Shanghai has invented an ingenious method for the transmission of telegraphic messages in Chinese. The China Mail describes the apparatus as consisting of several thousands of small wooden blocks having on the one end a Chinese character; the blocks are arranged systematically in cases, so as to be readily found, and with the Chinese character on the end of each showing upwards. To transmit a message in Chinese the proceeding is as follows: A native assistant, appointed for the purpose, takes from the cases the blocks with the Chinese characters as written in the message tendered for transmission, and, placing them in proper order, takes an impression of the number ends; these numbers are then telegraphed to the desired destination. At the receiving station are cases of wooden blocks arranged in an opposite manner to those at the forwarding station, i. e., with the Chinese characters cut into the one end and the other end having a number on it showing upwards. On receipt of the telegram the blocks bearing the numbers telegraphed are selected, and with the type end of these the message is printed off in Chinese. The European signaler of course has not the remotest idea of the sense or purpose of the message; but from the system adopted correctness in transmission is ensured.

— Nearly all the daily papers are at considerable pains to inform us each day that "the following list" of overland passengers "will arrive in San Francisco" at such a time. The list consists of those who passed Ogden two days before. It does not seem to have occurred to our contemporaries that there are several way stations, including Sacramento, at which it is possible for a man who has passed Ogden to get off; and at which, in fact, about one-third actually do get off. Now neighbors, we beg you not to act upon this hint, and say simply, that these passengers have passed Ogden; that would be meagerly true, and very basely sensible.

— Mr. Hoyle, the only man who ever lived from whose decision there was no appeal, the undisputed and indisputable authority in all games of cards, is dead. The number of persons interested in his decisions is considerably greater down below than here, and it was proper that he should go where he could be most widely useful. As the climate of that region is not favorable to the preservation of books, the personal presence of authors is commonly required. We have no doubt, however, that Mr. Hoyle would be very welcome in the other place, if the pious retain after death their tendency to quarrel over their cards.

— A bevy of darkies recently held a picnic in a grave-yard, and some indignation has been expressed at the sacrilegious proceeding. We do not regard it as well grounded; if the devil is half as black as he is painted, the spectacle of tawny feet meandering among the sepulchres is not sufficiently novel to alarm the sheeted dead.

Mosquitoes Compelling a Sailor to Drown Himself.

The mosquitoes of Burmah (says the Madras Mail) have a terrible reputation, but we never imagined that they were such formidable wretches that they could compel even a sailor to commit suicide. Yet that is the character a local paper gives them. It would appear that some years ago a sailor walking as sentry on the gangway of her Majesty's frigate Fox, when that vessel was lying at anchor on the Irrawady, was dreadfully teased and excited by the swarms of mosquitoes which kept worrying him. "No amount of fighting had the least effect on them. Finally he gave up in despair, and calling to his comrade Bob, 'I say Bob,' he inquired, 'do you think hell is worse than this — place' (using some dreadful expressions in reference to his tormentors). He said he did not know, 'but no doubt,' quoth Bob, 'it is pretty bad here, and unless we get the skin of an elephant, these burning stinging beasts will eat us all up alive.' " The sufferer remarked, "Good bye, Bob, I am going to see if it is not cooler there than it is here." With that he walked up the steps and gave one jump and away overboard he went, to sink or rise no more. The watch was roused with the cry "a man overboard." Boats were lowered, and every search made to recover the infatuated man who wanted to get away from the pestering worrying mosquitoes and could not. He committed suicide in the frenzy produced by them. A court of inquiry was held next day, and their verdict was "drowned himself when mad from the stings of swarms of mosquitoes." The Commodore sent ashore and bought bookmakin enough in town to supply each man with a set of mosquito nets or curtains, when the misery of these poor men was brought to a happy close.

A Precis.

Our able and ingenious friend the penny-a-liner is to be congratulated on the success with which he has made much out of little in this instance: "The large county of Down enjoys a gratifying immunity from crime. The calendar at the present assizes contains only eleven cases, of which but one—in which three railway officials are indicted for negligence causing loss of life—is of any public importance. Mr. Justice Lawson, who opened the commission on Saturday, remarked with satisfaction that, not only was the county free from all serious crime, but that convictions for intoxication were decreasing." All of which means, in a nutshell, that Down is looking up.

— "I, Hirsch Nison, will shoot myself. A bad wife is worse than death. I pray that my countrymen will not bury me as a murderer. My wife will pay all expenses." That is what he left behind him. Poor, despairing devil! done to death by a bad wife. And yet—O full and final compensation! a bad wife is good to pay funeral expenses. O ye who think through the hog-hole of divorce to escape the buffetings of matrimony—who in wilful desertion would seek refuge from extreme cruelty—take heart from the example of Hirsch Nison, and find comfort in his philosophy!

— The Mariposa Estate, Fremont's country seat, has been sold to a New York company for the enormous sum of fifteen millions of dollars. This stupendous amount is to be paid in the stock of the company, and it is supposed that such an influx of Eastern portable wealth will send this State spinning along the highway of prosperity with an impetus like that of an ox-drawn dirt-scraper. Fifteen millions of dollars! Why, it makes one's head swim. And all in nice clean shares, with engraving onto 'em! Lord, let thy servant depart in peace, for he has heard enough.

— Nicholas Connolly's statement will be published in to-morrow's Call. To-day it is crowded out.—Call. [Without any desire to penetrate the mystery surrounding the identity of Mr. Connolly, and with no wish to remove the inscrutable obscurity shrouding the purpose of his statement, we yet burn to know if the sun of that morrow rose upon that promised revelation; did Nick actually state? Will some one vouchsafe a little information to one who does not read the Call two days in succession?

— A bark has arrived at Santa Cruz with materials for the regular autumn exposition at the works of the California Powder Company. The employes have settled their temporal affairs, and the Superintendent has offered the usual reward to the man who stays longest. It is noteworthy that for several years this prize has not been claimed.

— A youth of fifteen summers, in Oregon, has poisoned his mother. Before condemning him it is fair to hear his defense: he wanted to plunder the house, and the old lady was in the way.

New Food from Australia.

We learn from the last number of the Food Journal that a new meat, kangaroo tail, has begun to be imported into this country. As a rule, herbivorous animals are well adapted for the food of man, and kangaroos, the Lancet considers, form no exception to this rule. The excellence of their flesh was recognized by the settlers in Australia at a very early period. The tail, which is very large and fleshy, is regarded as an especial luxury; and kangaroo tail soup is probably one of the best kinds of soup ever placed upon the table in any land. It comes to this country in a perfectly fresh state in tins, like Australian beef and mutton, and is sold under the name of kangaroo venison. The specimens hitherto brought to the market are highly flavored by spices, and are very agreeable to the taste. They can be obtained from Mr. J. W. Billiatt, of Upper Thames street, London, in two-pound tins, at a price of 3s. a tin. It is probable that the bills are those of the Macropis Brunnii, which is common in many parts of Australia and Van Diemen's Land.

A Successful Swindler.

Hundreds of persons of note have recently received letters from a man claiming to have in his possession a box containing diamonds to the amount of four millions of francs, and important papers belonging to the Empress, this box, it is said, having been extracted from the Tuileries during the confusion consequent on the events of September 4th. The letters state that their author being now in prison, and therefore unable to take advantage of his rich booty, offers, on payment of 2,000 francs, at a certain given address, to put the donor in possession of the box. The contents would then be either realized by sale or given up to their rightful owner on payment of a certain sum, the proceeds in both cases to be equally divided between this novel kind of swindler and his dupe. It is scarcely necessary to say that the precious box has never existed, except in the fertile brain of the letter writer. Several credulous persons have, nevertheless, been mulcted of their 2,000 francs.

An Economical Parson.

A London clergyman, the Rev. Henry Venn Hebert, claims to be carried on the tramways at the workmen's fare—viz., 1d. from Westminster Bridge to Brixton. The conductor having charged 3d., the Reverend gentleman summoned him before the Lambeth magistrate for the 2d. in dispute. The point, however, really at issue, was whether the company was authorized to charge general travelers by what are called "workmen's trains," two of which the company have, under their Act, to provide daily for "artisans, mechanics and laborers," more than the penny toll levied upon such persons. It was stated that the company, finding these trains a great convenience to workmen going to and from their labor, now run several each morning and evening, in lieu of the statutory pair. The magistrate decided against the Reverend gentleman, as not being "a laborer, artisan or mechanic," according to the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

— The most striking instance of intelligence in a dying man that we have had the happiness to record was that of Octavius Lapoint, who, when writhing with the pangs of poison, refused to unclasp his jaws to receive a stomach-pump, so long as Dr. C. C. O'Donnell was at the handle. Mr. Lapoint preferred to die, and die he did. Whenever Dr. O'Donnell shall exhibit a similar willingness, we shall be pleased to mash the head of the man who shall interpose an objection.

— An Ohio gentleman, whom the conscientious telegraph is careful to describe as "a well known citizen, remarkable for his religious fervor," has had the misfortune to be arrested with counterfeit money upon his person. He had previously enjoyed the unhappiness of passing it upon his neighbors for some months. This only proves that it is impossible to serve God and Mammon, though the ease with which one may serve God and Gammon is proverbial.

— Some soppy sentimentalizer writes to the Bulletin favoring a "national memorial day," wherein all are to turn out and spread posies on the graves of the dead. Our own impression is that it would be more sensible to use quinine and carbolic acid. It is about an even chance that the soppy sentimentalizer keeps a whiskey shop out at the cemetery. Or possibly he is a thrifty florist, who would make a market for his wares.

— The Bulletin says the railroad between San José and Alviso is "assuming a definite shape," but neglects to state whether it is to be a parallelogram, a circle, a triangle or a dodecahedron. And that paper has the impudence to claim that its news reports are full and copious!

Only a Dream.

Only a summer dream, Sport of an idle day, A meadow range, a word beside the stream, A parting and—away!	Shadows of leaf and bird Fall on the sunny grass; But over it the shadow that I love Never again shall pass.
Only a dream of Love, Of heart inclined to heart— As clouds that in the blue of heaven meet, As white clouds cling and part.	The summer voices blend In music as of yore, But from the melody has dropt a note: There will be song no more.
We dream'd and we awoke; No more! But ah, for dreams Engender'd of the subtle light of Love, Bright with its iris gleams!	The glory and the wealth Of Nature all things share, But in my heart is no responsive throb That tells me it is fair.
Again the meadow flowers, The waters rippling speed, The willows wave as in the dream; but I, Why should I, waking, heed?	Back on the sunny dream I turn an aching gaze, But the clear splendor of its glory throws A shadow on my days.
—Belgravia.	Wm. Sawyer.

Singular Occurrence in the Harvest Field.

A somewhat extraordinary affair occurred in the harvest field at Sherring, a quiet village in Essex, England, which has given rise to considerable gossip in the locality. A farmer named Drayton was engaged superintending his harvest operations when one of his horses, which was carting corn, refused its load. The animal is stated to have been of a vicious disposition, and in spite of a tolerably free application of the whip, he refused to budge an inch, but kicked and plunged about very violently, and presently, like a piece of magic, sparks flew from its hoofs, and the cart and its load were instantaneously in a blaze. Mr. Brayton and his laborers tried in vain to save the horse, which seemed to be suffocated in a very short time, and fell down in its death struggles. The cart and its contents were burnt up, and the harness was also damaged.

A Thundering Face.

Appropos of Lablache, it was after a dinner at Gore House that I witnessed his extraordinary representation of a thunder-torm simply by facial expression. The gloom that gradually overspread his countenance appeared to deepen into actual darkness, and the terrific frown indicated the angry lowering of the tempest. The lightning commenced by winks of the eyes, and twitchings of the muscles of the face, succeeded by rapid sidelong movements of the mouth which wonderfully recalled to you the forked flashings that seem to rend the sky, the notions of thunder being conveyed by the shaking of his head. By degrees the lightning became less vivid, the frown relaxed, the gloom departed and a broad smile illuminating his expansive face assured you that the sun had broken through the clouds and the storm was over.—London Society.

— Market Inspector Bookstaver is kept very busy condemning lean poultry. He says that if farmers do not stop sending in attenuated hens, shadowy roosters and phantom pullets, they will incur a galling evil. Perhaps it has not occurred to Mr. Bookstaver that in purchasing this class of birds, housekeepers are not necessarily defrauded. True, lean poultry is not good to eat, but it is excellent for giving to the poor.

— Arizona has everlastingly disgraced herself. The other day, in a quarrel over twenty-five cents at a fare table, a man was incontinently killed. To prate of Arizona's resources after that will be mere folly. A country where people seek aid from the revolver in solving a simple problem of two-bits is beneath contempt. Immigrants will make a note of it.

— In his extraordinary boshography of Victoria Woodhull, Theodore Tilton says "such is her infinite estimate of other worlds over this," that "she would rather die than live." Such is our infinite estimate of dead pork over living sow that we would prefer that she should die.

— The people of Texas have finally been brought to see the beauties of thrift, and have resolved to be less lavish of their lucre. They have begun characteristically by refusing to pay their school-tax. We would suggest that another important saving might be made by declining to bury their dead.

Court Chat.

— The Emperor Napoleon left Camden House, Chiselhurst, accompanied by the Empress Eugénie and the Prince Imperial, on the 7th inst., en route for Southampton, where the Empress will embark for Spain. The Emperor and Prince Imperial will continue their journey to Torquay, where his Majesty purposes spending five or six weeks, subsequently returning to Chiselhurst, where the Imperial exiles have constantly resided since their arrival in England. The Empress goes to Spain to visit her mother, and will be absent about two months. The numerous reports circulated with regard to the purchase of an estate in England, by the Emperor Napoleon, are, we are authorized to state, entirely destitute of foundation.

— It had been agreed between the Sovereigns at Gastein that the particulars of the interview should be made public as far as the different embassies of the Continent were concerned, and that an official report should be sent to each. This was decidedly Bismarck's opinion; but it was overruled by the notions of older date, which still cling round the Emperor of Austria, who, after receiving a telegram from the Archduchess Sophia, made decided objection to the proposition, and thus all explanation on the subject of the interviews between the Emperors will be communicated only to those Powers who have manifested any disquietude concerning their motive.

— Many English and American tourists will learn with regret the sudden and shocking death of Count Bela Szapary, through a railway accident near Wurtzburg. Count Szapary and a Russian gentleman were the only persons killed. There were five or six others severely wounded. Count Lamnay, the Hungarian Minister of Finance, who was in the same train, probably owes his safety to being late at Frankfort, whereby he was forced to occupy a carriage in the rear of the train, instead of one in the front, where the through carriages for Hungary happened to be.

— Two facts in Earl Russell's life may be noticed. When he was young he was so weakly that no one supposed he would live to be an old man; and for many years this weakness continued. But when he got to be between sixty and seventy—nearer sixty than seventy, we fancy—he picked up amazingly, gathered flesh, and now he has nearly reached the age of fourscore, a greater age than any Russell has reached, it is said, for a century or more.

— The Empress Eugénie, at the time of the declaration of war, was engaged in the formation of a society to supply work at home for females, especially for young girls who had been obliged to work on account of reverses of fortune. This work, rendered more necessary than ever after the disasters of France, is about to be recommenced, and the Empress, though in exile, has willingly become patroness of the society.

— It is announced in the Gazette officially that the Queen has been pleased to appoint the Right Hon. Russell Gurney, M.P., one of her Majesty's Counsel and Recorder of the City of London, to be her Majesty's Commissioner for the settlement of British and American claims under the 12th Article of the Treaty of Washington of the 8th of May, 1871.

— The report published by some newspapers that the portraits of the Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Eugénie, which were presented to the Imperial Austrian family after the interview at Salzburg in 1867, were removed from the castle on the occasion of the present visit of the Emperor of Germany, is without foundation.

— It is perhaps not generally known that the title "Prince" bestowed upon Bismarck is only personal, not hereditary, the children of the great man remaining as before, simple counts and countesses. This limitation of the princely title to the person of the Chancellor was made by the Emperor at his own request.

— The visit of the Princess Louisa and the Marquis of Lorn to Kintyre, which, as at first announced, was to have taken place on September 9th, has been postponed. It probably will be made at the latter end of the month.

— Queen Victoria's physicians say her retirement from society and from all public demonstrations is in consequence of their professional advice. They say she has nervous troubles, which might easily be converted by excitement into a dangerous malady.

— The Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse-Darmstadt and suite have left Belgium and arrived in London; their Royal Highnesses crossed over in the Royal yacht Victoria. The Prince and Princess left town again, and proceeded to Balmoral.

— The Napoleonic eagle over the portal of the French Embassy at Berlin has just been concealed behind a zinc ornament. Not having been removed, it may be unveiled again, should events serve.

— The death is announced, at Vitry le Français, of the Duchesse du Plessis d'Arromée, aged 100 years. The Duchesse, it is added, was almost a contemporary of Louis XV.

— The work at Shirley-house, Croydon, necessary to fit it for the residence of the Emperor Napoleon, is being pushed forward with great activity.

— We are sorry to learn that the health of her Royal Highness Princess Christian has not improved since her absence from England.

— The Queen is expected to remain at Balmoral till the early part of November, and then return to Windsor Castle.

A Glance Ahead.

The most remarkable paper in Fraser, or at least the most novel, is one on the probable results of the federation of Great Britain with her colonies. The writer attributes to that great change—he is writing at a future period. The revivification of the Empire, the restoration of its power, and the nearly complete extinction of pauperism: "A Federal Great Britain has become the most powerful nation of the world. Even the United States Republic desires to enter the Federation, and will probably do so. The Federal navy is unquestionably the sovereign of the seas. Over and over again, war between other nations has been authoritatively arrested by the Federal Government. Indeed, the Federation, in conjunction with the United States, has decided that the free navigation of the ocean shall not be interrupted by the territorial wars of European nations. The taxation of Great Britain proper has been greatly reduced by the contributions from other parts of the Dominions towards the cost of the Federal navy, and by the decline of pauperism; property has risen enormously in value throughout those Dominions; and the public loans required are negotiated on very greatly improved conditions, as compared with those to which the Colonial Governments had to submit. Countries which were, comparatively, wildernesses, are covered with population, and have the aspect and the solid conveniences of old-established lands. Ireland, so long troublesome, afflicted, and disaffected, enjoys, as a member of the Confederation, a well-regulated internal government, not dissimilar to the form of that existing in what were colonies. Finally, the machinery of the Federal Constitution, improved as it has been by modifications which experience has from time to time shown to be necessary, works satisfactorily and well."

The Mexican Plagiarists.

A correspondent writing from Mazatlan says: "One of the peculiar products of the society is the plagiario or kidnapper. The ambition of his life is to abduct some wealthy personage and hold the victim in safe-keeping until ransomed by a large sum of money. The plagiario is not particular whether his game is a man, woman or child, so that gold in abundance is one of the possessions of the abducted. There have been some extraordinary cases of kidnapping, the latest among them being that of a Mrs. Charles, a French woman, who a short time ago went on a visit with her husband and other friends to the residence of Polak, at a place called Molino de Flores, near Otumba. Charles and the other male visitors had just gone out to take a look at things about the house, when nine bandits entered and boldly seized Mrs. Charles, whom they carried off as unceremoniously as if she belonged to them body and soul. The lady yelled for help and screamed in agony, but not until it was too late. Immediate chase was given, but without avail, for the plagiarios were well mounted on fleet horses, and having an accurate knowledge of the most impassable fastnesses, made their way to them. The next step will be a note addressed to her husband or friends, in which will be stated, in the most polite terms, the conditions upon which the lady will be returned to her lord and master. Women captured in this way are seldom injured, but it may be imagined that they suffer torture enough in mind."

Developing a Theory.

"A believer in the Darwinian theory" sends us the following: The derivation of man from an Ascidian reminds me of an illustration which throws great light upon the subject, I mean the analogous derivation of Pickled Cucumber from King Jeroboam. You think there is no possible connection between the two, just as you thought in the case of the man and the Ascidian. Very well; now mark how a plain tale shall put you down. King Jeroboam was of course Jeroboam King, affectionately shortened into Jerry King. That by natural process became Jer King, thence Jerkin, from which by easy transition Gerkin, which is identical with pickled cucumber. Q.E.D.—Madras Athenæum.

"The Thinker and the Worker."—GOVERNESS: "Now, May, you've got two things to look after"

MAY (who is eminently practical): "All right—band-box and carpet-bag!"

GOVERNESS: "And you've three things to take care of, Charlie. Now, what are they?"

CHARLIE (a dreamy and absent boy): "Three things to take care of? Oh! Oh! Yes! The world, the flesh, and the d—."

GOVERNESS: "What are you talking of, Charlie?"—Fun.

— Miss Lillian Edgerton will lecture this season upon the Cause and Cure of Goosying. The cause is a rather obscure one, but as for the cure, that is too simple a matter to require elaborate expounding. It consists, merely, in abbreviating the stature of woman by the length of a head, being careful to operate at the top.

The Mormon Trouble.

For the last quarter of a century or so, the Government of the United States has been engaged in an internecine war with a handful of enthusiastic, earnest men, who by industry and a careful minding of their own business have done much toward settling up and developing the interior of our continent. Some forty years ago one Joseph Smith claims to have found in Western New York certain tablets of bronze, covered over with curious hieroglyphics, which, upon being translated, mysteriously melted away. From this came the "Book of Mormon," and Mormon was a leader of the lost tribes of Israel. Jo. Smith became the prophet of a new religion. These enthusiastic disciples of a new creed planted themselves at Nauvoo, on the Mississippi, laid the foundations of a Temple and the beginning of a Jerusalem which should be the home of "the Latter Day Saints." Troubles followed, rapine and murder, and the Saints, after the death of Smith, received a new revelation, went forth into the wilderness, and some twenty-five years ago brought up in the valley of the great Salt Lake, and commenced the building of a new temple, under the leadership of Brigham Young, the "Son of the Lord." Salt Lake valley was an oasis in the midst of the great American desert; there was not a civilized settlement, nor a white family, nor an acre of cultivated land within a radius of one thousand miles. From all parts of Europe and America there came the poorest of God's earth; from the hills of Wales, the mines of Cornwall, the cabins of Scandinavia, the barren pine forests of Sweden, the poorest and the most ignorant of God's forsaken ones, daring the storms of ocean and the perils of the plains, seeking a home in this distant spot. There they have lived and toiled; they have grown to be an hundred thousand strong; they have made the "desert to blossom as the rose;" they have brought smiling plenty around them; they have cultivated broad acres; they have builded a city; they have constructed a tabernacle for worship; they have hid deep and solid the foundations of a gorgeous temple; they have organized a society in which there is neither idleness, poverty, prostitution or crime; they have accumulated riches; they have subdued the savages; they have maintained peace and order; their government is honestly administered; their taxes are nominal. Yet every administration wars with the Mormons; once an army has been sent against them costing $80,000,000. Regiments have been stationed in their midst; contracts for transportation, mules, supplies and all the other stealing appliances have made politicians rich; periodically a governor and a court is sent them—they are either bought or bribed, or else the machinery of government and courts is set in motion to annoy and disturb them—because, and simply and only because, Mormonism recognizes concubinage instead of prostitution. By the Mormon religion a man may have a plurality of wives, instead of, as by the religion of Jesus, only one. A Mormon must support his wives and children; a Christian may abandon his one and secretly keep a hundred. Mormonism imitates Solomon and the patriarchs—Christianity does not. In California it is not a crime to keep a harem—in Salt Lake it is. Deseret has a new judge—a new broom—and his determination is to sweep clean the Territory of superfluous wives. He is bound to enforce the new law of Congress against polygamy regardless of all social consequences; he is piously determined to invade families and drag out the skeletons from the family hearthstone; he is patriotically engaged in making harlots of those who now at least think themselves wives. This business is neither creditable to the government, nor, do we think, quite respectable to the court. We do not justify polygamy. It is not in harmony with the civilization of the age; but under the circumstances the best and easiest thing to do is to ignore its existence and let the custom die out. It is no longer practiced in Utah—the church has in fact abandoned it—no new marriages are being contracted. Our advice is, let the old wives alone, but if new contracts are being entered into in defiance of the law, let the law be enforced. As to the marriages entered into before the passage of the law, the act is ex post facto. In our opinion it is a put up job to black mail Brigham Young and his apostles.

— We have received the following favor from Sacramento, of date October 2d, and of signature J. C.: "Dear News Letter:—You don't seem to know why the overland passenger list is not published until two days after the cars leave Ogden, and I will enlighten you. The list comes by the Railroad telegraph to the Record (the Railroad organ), and is purposely kept back, in order to keep the Union from publishing it till after the passengers have left Sacramento. Now do you see?" Yes, do you? But why the mischief does not the Union get mad about it and publish an article reflecting upon the Railroad? The patient forbearance of some journals is phenomenal, and there is a point beyond which phenomenality ceases to be a virtue. We would not wish to be understood as aspiring to the position of adviser, but would crave the courtesy of being permitted to remark that a successful newspaper cannot be conducted upon a basis of pure and unwavering forbearance.

— After considerable litigation a boot-maker named Russell has recovered three hundred dollars from another named Kelly, for libel. As the trial of the case has advertised one establishment about as much as the other, it is presumed that the litigants will share the costs and the penalty impartially between them after setting aside ten cents to pay for this notice. We think our bill is reasonable; we tax people according to our estimate of their importance.

George H. Ensign.--[Died October 2d, 1871.]

What higher praise or nobler tribute pay
 To one mourned by a thousand friends,
 Than but to say, Here stand we sorrowing!
 To others raise the granite columns grey
 And pillar up the bronzed domes.
 He whose fair fame and bright renown
 Rests on the hearts of friends,
 Is surer held and more enduring lasts.

The Internationale.

Old Hard-Hand is beginning to assert himself. He has wiped his nose upon the sleeve of his blouse, knuckled the perspiration from his gummy eye and taken a look at the situation. He sees that he does not enjoy a political importance commensurate with his numbers, nor social advantages suitable to his merit. He has gone to work—rather intelligently, it must be confessed—and organized himself into the Société Internationale, for the redress of his several grievances. If there is in this potent organization half as much fire as the smoke would seem to indicate, men who wear clean shirts will soon have to look as closely to their heads as they now do to their linen. The great lubberly behemoth at the bottom of society is beginning to trouble the waters by poking his wide head above the surface, with the tolerably obvious design of crunching certain freighted argosies of ours, the shadows of which have floated across his eyes down there below. Mr. Muscle is become a problem, and does not appear to be in the humor to wait for us to solve him: he is moving in the matter himself. It is not improbable that he will end by solving us. The "working element" is working in a particularly unpleasant effervescence, which suggests nothing so much as the quiet satisfaction of getting away from it, and staying there. Now of course the average laboring man, of whom the Internationale is mainly composed, is a very brainless ass, but there is a singular method in his asininity that bodes no good to anybody. Since the pounding he got for kicking out the Parisian dash-board, he has been economical of his heels, but he has displayed a vexatious aptitude for lying down in harness. Metaphor aside, it is evident enough that in both Europe and America the lower orders of society are placing themselves in a most threatening antagonism to the higher, and that this condition is not likely to end in a peaceful adjustment of the differences between the two. These differences have been the slow growth of more centuries than are noted in our chronology, and it is very unphilosophical to suppose they can be speedily reconciled. But that a determined attempt to recouile them will be made during the life of the present generation, is as plain as a pike-staff. The form which this attempt will take is sufficiently well indicated by the spirit of the late lamented Commune. If it shall be made with a bitterness proportioned to the importance of the issue, it is probable that civilization is upon the eve of enjoying a brief respite from the trouble of existing: we are "in" for some more dark ages. It is the misfortune of the canaille not to be able to draw a line between adjusting a difference and obliterating a distinction, and it is quite within the bounds of probability that this matter between them and us will be settled by them according to the latter method. Our friends of the newspaper press will now confer the usual favor of platitudinizing ament the invention of printing, the power of those twin conservators, religion and steam, the vitality of modern institutions, and the rest of it; but there is absolutely no evidence that ten centuries hence our posterity will not be wearing the skins of wild animals, and waging civil strife with clubs and stone axes.

— The water-gulpers are organizing another order of supreme lunatics, called Champions of the Red Cross. This new concern, like the Sons of Temperance, takes in the women, and like the Daughters of Rebecca embraces the males. Why these worthy people call themselves Champions of the Red Cross we cannot hope to clearly comprehend until we shall learn what the Red Cross is, and the nature of its distress. If it can be shown that it is anything more than an idealized water-pump, and that it endures any more serious oppression than being overworked by a zealous tectotoler, we shall be pleased to splinter a lance in its defense, provided the salary is satisfactory. But we shall expect the Order to supply us with at least a pint of "Dutch courage" for each encounter.

— Mr. Seward has returned to—or rather arrived at—New York, having completed the circuit of the globe. He has received the most extraordinary honors ever accorded to a private citizen, in every country through which he has passed. At every court and capital he was welcomed with marks of the most profound respect. The great of all nations have contended with one another for the honor of exalting him. Apparently these people are darkly unaware that the Examiner newspaper does not approve of Mr. Seward and has been flinging mud at him. Perhaps, however, the copious handfuls of unpleasantness did not adhere to Mr. Seward's polished escutcheon. Well, thank Heaven, there is more dirt where that came from! Next!

The Newly-Invented Explosive Ball.

A celebrated French engineer officer named Pertuiset, arrived in this city some three weeks ago en route for Japan and China. He brings with him specimens of a bullet which explodes on striking an object, and which the inventor claims is fearfully fatal in its effects. M. Pertuiset followed in the footsteps of the famous Girard, and his main delight was lion hunting in Africa, where he used the explosive ball of Devisme, which he found inefficient; for one day he lodged one of them in the body of a lion at only five yards distant and the beast ran away for two miles before he died, consequently before the explosion took place. Onr Nimroc thereupon returned to Paris and set to work to produce a bullet whose effect should be more immediate. He succeeded, and the Russian Government, after having been convinced of its practicability, ordered a large supply. Prussia gave an order for five millions, and France and Austria only waited their turn to be supplied. In the meantime, experiments that were made proved the effect of these balls to be so barbarously destructive, that it was unanimously resolved, at a Congress of the European Powers held in 1866, that such a cruel instrument of war should not be employed in their armies, but confined to wild beasts and less human game. So that M. Pertuiset has come here, after a severe ordeal at Washington, which was very successful, and proposes to offer his invention to those engaged in whaling, the seal fishery, or to the hunters of large game. To prove the effective nature of his explosive balls, a committee of skillful and scientific gentlemen was requested to meet this week at the Agricultural Park. The firing was made at lumber ten inches thick, some of the wood being California laurel and others Oregon and Puget Sound white pine. The first shots were made at light wood, and the balls went clean through it, at the same time the orifice of the exit was much greater than that of the entrance, and the bore was carbonized, showing explosion and combustion. The next experiment was made at some heavy lumber, at first with a ball of small calibre. It penetrated to a considerable depth, exploded and slightly fractured the wood around. The experimenter now used a larger ball, and the lumber was split to pieces and scattered around. Then some tightly-folded paper, half a foot in thickness, was used as a target; paper being, as is well known, one of the most resistant substances to bullets. The greater part of the balls went right through, making a very large hole, as may be seen at Liddle & Kaedling's, Washington street, where the targets now are. This was an interesting experiment, showing the successive explosions of the ball as it burnt its way through the obstacle. At first there is a hole the size of the bullet, then comes an explosion and the hole enlarges, then other explosions, until finally where the ball emerged the hole is fully five inches in diameter. So that there is a series of explosions during the course of the ball through a body. A ball for whalers was next fired into a large bundle of paper, and the explosion was terrific. Hardly a shred was left, and the whole mass was scorched and scattered far and wide by the shock. We thought that even a whale would be torn to fragments by such a torpedo. On inquiry we found that the ball itself is quite safe to handle, and can be thrown on the ground without exploding. There are no caps inside the bullet, nor is the powder explosive at the usual temperature, but when fired out of the rifle it attains a great heat, nearly 200 degrees, and will explode on the slightest contact with a foreign body. Herein lies the great merit of the invention, if merit may be claimed for so destructive a projectile. We question if a grizzly, or a sea lion, or a puma, or a whale would entirely agree with the civilized world in admiring the invention of M. Pertuiset.

— At the last meeting of the Academy of Naturals, the proceedings were nearly as hereinbelow stated: Professor Hanks exhibited a brick taken out of the stomach of a deer. He called attention to the peculiar formation of the thing, it being considerably wider than it was thick, and longer than wide. Dr. Blake said this might be owing to the shape of the mold in which it had originally been pressed. He had bricks exactly similar in his own stomach. Professor Kellogg thought the peculiar shape of the missile might be owing to the configuration of the bowels in which it had been imbedded. That, however, was not the matter they had come there to discuss, and—Dr. Cooper wished (rather angrily) to know if the last speaker intended, by using the word "missile," to beg the whole question. The last speaker did not so intend, but would take the liberty to beg a chew of tobacco if the gentleman had such about him. The gentleman had not; he had bestowed his last quid upon Professor Hanks. Besides, he wanted it himself, and, in addition, he did not use tobacco. The President then explained that the object of the meeting was to ascertain how the brick got into the deer, and what the devil it was doing there. Dr. Gibbons was quite of the opinion that it had been hurled through the animal's ribs by some rascally school-boy. Also, he thought it had been flung in by an earthquake—to which he begged permission to make some elaborate allusion. He was beaten on the head with a joint of stovepipe and sent home. After order had been restored, a vote was taken, and it was decided that the brick had been first constructed and then the deer built round it. Professor Hanks then began reading a paper concerning some dust that had befallen a ship at sea, but our reporter preferred to follow home the corpse of Dr. Gibbons and sit up with it. What are you laughing at? It's true, so help us God! Gib.'s as dead as a smashed caterpillar. There will be no more earthquakes.

Cotton in California.

A few sanguine individuals, and as sagacious as sanguine, have maintained for some years the adaptability of the soil and climate of some of our more southern valleys for the growth of cotton. The results of an attempt to raise cotton this year by Maj. John L. Strong and his brother, in Merced and Los Angeles counties, have been so marked as to turn attention to that branch of industry as one destined to become very soon one of great importance and profit. The field of cotton belonging to the brothers in Merced County consists of seventy-five acres, and the crop is now being gathered. The yield is such as to create much interest in the new branch of industry thus inaugurated. The Snelling Argus says quite a furore is created among the land speculators for cotton growing in consequence of the results of Strong's experiments. The information Maj. Strong furnishes must have its effect in turning attention from grain raising in the warmer districts of the State to the production of an article that will always command a market and yield larger profits for cultivation than any of the cereals. Strong himself is so well satisfied with his experiment that he says he is gathering around him a corps of young and experienced cotton planters from the South and hopes to be able to plant three thousand acres next year. Should the design be executed the new branch of industry will be fairly begun in California, and if crowned with success, an impetus will be given to cotton raising which shall place the staple among our chief products at once. Maj. Strong estimates the yield of his field this year, from what has been gathered, at 375 pounds of ginned cotton per acre, worth twenty cents a pound in the market. The cost of marketing is placed at two-fifths of the whole, which leaves a handsome profit for the planter. He gives the cost of producing a pound of ginned cotton in Merced County at six cents, but cultivated on a large scale the cost would be lessened. The profits as compared with raising wheat and corn this year are far greater, and in a fair season Maj. Strong is confident the yield will be double that of this, and even judged by this year's crop the capacity of California in the production of cotton is equal to the average in Mississippi, from which State Strong came as a successful cotton planter. The yield in Merced County fully meets the expectations of the experimenter, and is regarded as an augury of better results under more favorable circumstances and after larger experience.

— It is stated that the late Mr. Grote, the historian, requested upon his death bed that his brain might be unboxed and weighed. His wish was complied with, and that organ was found to be disgracefully buoyant. Intellectual luminaries flickering fitfully in their sockets will do well to rest content with the radiance they have emitted, and not provoke a scrutiny of their wick.

— A committee of Supervisors is in the Clear Lake country hunting up a more copious water supply for this city. An increased supply is not what we need; the present quantity is ample for making all the punches that we really require. What we want is an improvement in the quality; to dilute good whisky with the article furnished at present, is something akin to sacrifice.

— Theodore Tilton explains certain peculiarities in the mental constitution of Victoria Woodhull by the fact that her father commonly corrected her with a handsaw. The kind of tool employed is usually determined by the nature of the material upon which it is to be used; young Vic was probably a blockhead. Possibly, however, the handsaw was not used upon her head.

— Defaulters intending suicide will find the following form tolerably well adapted to their needs: "I can no longer endure this deep disgrace, and the thought of the shame my rascality has brought upon my darling wife and little ones. I desire to be buried alongside my mother. May God have mercy upon my thieving soul, and forgive me for being detected!"

— If Mankind is willing, we crave permission to respectfully propound the conundrum following: Why is it that when the death of a very aged person is announced it is usually added that the melancholy event occurred at an almshouse? Cannot these wretches perish comfortably anywhere else? Mankind, you are what the inimitable Chaucer would call a beeste.

— It is stated that the Woman's Rights movement has extended to Turkey, and women are now accorded privileges heretofore unknown. For example, a wife whose charms are waning is given a choice between bow-stringing and drowning in a sack. This radical concession is regarded with grave apprehension by the conservative element.

John's Wife.

[ BY EMMA BASSETT. ]

A young wife stood with her hand on the broom,
 And looked around the little room.
 "Nothing but toil forever," she said;
 "From early morn, till the light has fled.
 If you were only a merchant, now,
 We need not live by the sweat of our brow."
 Pegging away, spoke shoemaker John—
 "We ne'er see well what we're standing on."

A lady stood by her husband's chair
 And quietly passed her hand o'er his hair.
 "You never have time for me, now," she said,
 And a tear-drop fell on the low bent head.
 "If we were only rich, my dear,
 With nothing to do from year to year,
 But amuse each other—oh, dear me!
 What a happy woman I should be."
 Looking up from his ledger, spoke merchant John:
 "We ne'er see well what we're standing on."

A stately form, in velvet dressed:
 A diamond gleaming on her breast.
 "Nothing but toil for fashion," she said;
 "Till I sometimes wish that I were dead.
 If I might cast this wealth aside,
 And be once more the poor man's bride!"
 From his easy chair, spoke gentleman John;
 "We ne'er see well what we're standing on."

Real Estate in San Francisco.

The San Francisco Real Estate Circular gives the following account of the number and value of sales of real estate made in all sections of the city and county in September, 1871:

Section.	Sales.	Amount.
Fifty Vistas.....	30	$271,450
One Hundred Vistas.....	12	63,975
City Slip and Water Lots.....	3	95,800
South Beach.....	2	1,800
Potrero.....	24	56,513
Mission Addition.....	53	151,539
Western Addition.....	40	123,585
South San Francisco.....	3	1,320
Homestead Associations.....	116	64,775
Outside Lands.....	26	39,187
Tax, Blackmail and Skeleton Titles.....	9	4,523
Total.....	318	$880,386

Many persons insist that the real estate market has improved since the City Hall sale. We regret to say that we cannot agree with them. Neither the volume of sales or the prices paid last month exhibits any improvement. Only one sale—that on McAllister street—was made at an extreme price, while about a dozen sales of suburban property were made at reduced rates. We do not mean to say that the market is in a worse condition than it has been, for it is not; we only wish it understood that the large class of property owners who are restive under stationary prices, and who are constantly giving out a turn has come, are again mistaken. They ardently wish to see a change that they may unload, and they imagine that circulating rumors of improvement will help to bring it about. It is very doubtful that any advance in prices or increase in transactions can be counted on before next Spring. A heavy fall of rain in November and December might, however, impart a confidence to the market which would result in an immediate real estate activity.

— The following fascinating item is in all the newspapers; why should it not be in this? "Madame Thiers is in the habit of going down herself to the cellar to get out wine for the Presidential dinners." Why does she not remain in the kitchen flaying potatoes, and leave republican simplicity to the old man!

— All employes in the Lowell factories who have conscientious scruples against vaccination are promptly discharged. In their eagerness to evade sore arms, they miss a golden opportunity to perish of consumption and overwork.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

[Report for the Week ending November 7th, 1871.]

— "The heated term," comprising a considerable portion of the period under review, has been the occasion of lessened activity in the import markets, although we fail to perceive any falling off in the general jobbing trade of the city. Business, for the most part, shows life and activity. The eagerness of buyers to secure the products of the State, at high prices, adds material wealth to the masses, who are thereby placed in possession of ready means, with which to cancel their indebtedness to traders, thus enabling our merchants to meet their engagements with unusual promptness. We have a large fleet of ships now in our harbor, discharging coals and general cargo. Arrivals, of late, have been more than usually numerous, and it is unfortunate, for all concerned, that we are unable to furnish our usual breadstuffs supply for freight; nor have we got anything else to make good the deficiency; consequently, many ships are compelled to depart in ballast, seeking freight elsewhere. In presenting a brief epitome of our markets, we notice that our imports of coffee for the current year are nearly double those of the same period in 1870, aggregating for the past nine months about eleven million pounds. Holders exhibit much firmness, under the influence of an active interior trade. Of coals, our imports in the aggregate are 27,000 tons less than for the same period in 1870. The market for the moment is bare of supplies in first hands, yet a liberal local supply keeps prices greatly in check. Of rice, our imports have been considerably greater than for the first nine months of 1870—say an excess of ten million pounds—and yet, by reason of a healthy trade demand, prices are well sustained. The imports of sugar for the current year have been surprisingly large, and with an active local and interior trade, stocks in first hands, on sale, outside of the refineries, are usually small and prices firmly sustained. Our total imports for nine months exceed forty-five million pounds, against thirty-one millions for same period last year. As for teas, a large import trade has been done, much of it, however, in transit, passing East overland in bond, not being entered at our Custom-house. The market shows firmness, leading holders manifesting no desire to force sales.

— Imports of Sugar from January 1st to October 1st: Eastern, bbls 101; Manila, lbs 4,439,029; pkgs 85,441; Hawaiian, lbs 11,317,987; Peruvian, lbs 9,512,547; Bata-vian, lbs 7,820,527, pkgs 1,973; Central American, lbs 2,020,005; China, lbs 3,030,812; Mexican, lbs 676,924; Tahitian, lbs 40,521. Imports thus far during the current year exceed those for same period in 1870 by upward of 14,000,000 lbs, and yet it is believed that our stocks are considerably less, owing to increased consumption. The importation of 39,365 bags Manila per Derby is included in the above state-ment. This large cargo came direct to the California Refinery. The market for Hawaiian and other Raws is but poorly supplied, stocks outside the refineries be-ing unusually light for the season. We quote Grocery grades from 8½@11½c, with sales of 1,500 kegs Hawaiian. The demand is active for low and high grades; the medium grades are more plentiful and less called for. No Beet Sugar of the new crop has yet been delivered. We quote California Cube, 15c; Circle A Crushed, 14½c; Granulated, 14c; Powdered, 14½c—all in bbls; hf bbls command ½c more. Yellow Coffee and Golden C, 12½@13c, latter rate for extra.—Commercial Herald.

— Imports of coffee from January 1st to October 1st: Rio, lbs 827,360; Java, lbs 368,878, sks 809; Manila, lbs 553,351, sks 1,120; Hawaiian, lbs 82,154; Central American, lbs 8,895,168, pkgs 202; Tahitian, lbs 13,418; San Domingo lbs 2,790; Mocha, lbs 1,650. The ship Derby, from Manila, brought but 1,120 bags. The in-voice of 800 bags Java, ex Uraive, is still held at 25c. Other parcels of this de-scription continue to reach us by rail and via Panama from New York and Boston, selling, for the most part, at 24c. We note sales of 1,500 bags Guatemala, in lots, at 16½@16¾c.; prime Costa Rica, 17c. We quote Rio and Manila at 16c. ½ lb. Im-ports for the first nine months of the current year, as compared with the same period last year:

	1870.	1871.		1870.	1871.
Rio, lbs.....	647,254	827,360	Central American, lbs.....	3,741,132	8,920,168
Java, lbs.....		475,818	Mocha, lbs.....	1,945	1,650
Manila, lbs.....	9,833	664,211	Tahitian, lbs.....		13,418
Hawaiian, lbs.....	94,421	82,154	San Domingo, lbs.....		2,790
Totals.....				4,491,435	10,987,990

— Imports of Teas from January 1st to October 1st: China, lbs 803,976, pkgs 942; Japan, lbs 1,886,463, pkgs 2,229. Imports thus far during the current year are somewhat in excess of same period of 1870, without making any account of the large cargoes that have arrived here in transit and which go East in bond, not being entered at our Custom-house. Freight to New York have been advanced during the week from $3 75 to $3 90 ½ 100 pounds, and yet, notwithstanding these and other adverse circumstances, our overland trade with Atlantic cities is steadily growing. We note a sale, by telegraph, of 700 pkgs Japans, various grades, for New York, at 50@90c. This was brought about by sending a sample package by express to New York, costing, perhaps, $10, and shows what a little pluck and perseverance will accomplish. We are aware of other sales to Chicagoans, direct, who are here buying such chops as are best suited to their trade. Prices un-changed.—Commercial Herald.

— The sale of American ship War Hawk and cargo, by order of the United States Marshal, has been effected to secure a bottomry bond for repairs made at Rio. The coal, say 1,300 tons, was first sold at $9.50 per ton, and since then the vessel and apparel for the sum of $15,750. The ship was knocked down to C. A. Low & Co., understood to be purchased in behalf of the bondholder. The day following the above sale, Thos. J. Poulterer & Co. sold, by order of the underwriters and owners, for account of whom it may concern, for the sum of $1,100 gold coin, the British iron ship Talavera, built in five water-tight compartments, 1,161 tons register, classed A No. 1 at Liverpool Lloyds, with her anchors, sails, etc.; also, 1,450 tons of coal on board, as she now lies, inside of San Martin's Island, in San Ramon Bay (off the coast of Lower California), about 100 miles south of San Diego, lying stern on the shore, with two anchors down. J. O. Rountree was the buyer.

— Imports of Coal from January 1st to October 1st, 1870, 245,457 tons; for the same period this present year the amount was 238,181, showing a decrease of over 7,000 tons. The heavy imports of 40,000 tons during September have been placed, for the most part—Scotch and English Steam at $11@11 25; Australian, $11 50; West Hartley, $12 50; Cumberland in cks is being jobbed out at $23@24; same in bulk, $18@19. Imports of Nantaimo appear to be at an end for the present—price too low to be remunerative. Pacific Coast supplies include five hundred tons Seattle, sold at $10; 1,350 tons Bellingham Bay, $9, and 1,855 tons Coos Bay, $10, all ex ship. The price of Mt. Diablo is continued at $6 25@8 25.

— In Molasses and Syrup we note recent sales of about 500 bbls Hawaiian, in lots, at 20@22½c for common, and 25@30c for choice; kegs of same, 40c. A second invoice of South Boston Golden Syrup is at hand by rail, jobbing at 90c. The local supply of Golden Syrup is free, only limited by the demand. The product of the California Refinery, 90c in 5-gall kegs, 85@82½c for hf bbls and bbls, respectively. The San Francisco and Pacific Refinery is also making free deliveries at current rates.

— The imports of Rice thus far during the year show a considerable increase over same period last year, and yet, by reason of increased consumption, prices have been well sustained throughout. There is at present a good healthy trade requirement at 10@11c for Carolina and Hawaiian Table; China and Siam, re-cleaned, 7@7½c. The imports for the first nine months of the year show a large increase over those of the same period in 1870.

— In Metals, the leading importers and holders of Scotch Pig Iron are not disposed to press sales, though occasional sales, ex ship, are made at $33; jobbing sales, $34@35. The demand for manufactured iron is regular, though not large, at the recent advance in price of ½c. per lb for the entire line. We quote Banca Tin at 44@45c. The market for assorted Tin Plate is firm at the late rise.

— Our local money market is more than adequately supplied with loanable funds, and judging from the various reports which reach us from the mining regions, there is no reason to fear any stringency, especially as the crops are being moved without the least strain on the market, which has, furthermore, been reinforced by the arrival of $3,500,000 in legal tenders, sent by the Government under military escort, and destined for the various Pay Departments on this coast. During the week ending October 4th we shipped, to various points, treasure amounting to $556,843 10, irrespective of what went through the mails.—Commercial Herald.

— Imports of Gunpowder from January 1st to Oct. 1st: Eastern, kegs, 23,527, cases 2,549; California, kegs 71,177, cases 1,471. Eastern supplies of blasting are liberal. Dupont's, in iron kegs, is held at $3. Hazard's at the same. This is also the price of California in patent kegs.

— For Malt Liquors, the demand is fully equal to the supply, the trade buying freely as fast as received, and finding steady sale for all standard brands, including Blood's and Tennent's Scotch and English Ales and Porter, also Joule's Stone Ale, at current rates.

— Imports of Candles from January 1st to October 1st: Cases 88,042; Overland, bxs 37,216. Imports from the East, via Cape Horn, have of late been considerable, the bulk of them sold prior to arrival at full rates. The California supply is steadily increasing.

— The aggregate sales in the Stock Board, from September 28th to the 4th of October inclusive, amount to the sum of $3,414,633.

— The Suenor Mill and Mining Company will pay their second dividend of 50 cents per share on the 16th inst.

— The Spring Valley Water Company have declared a dividend of one-half of one per cent., payable on Tuesday.

— The Meadow Valley Mining Company announce a monthly dividend of $1.50 per share, payable next Friday.

— A number of married women in New York have bound themselves by oath not to dance with anybody but their husbands. If the husbands are endowed with common sense (being husbands they are probably not) they will bind themselves by oath not to dance.

Bringing the County of Peebles into Notice.

Mr. Patrick Robertson, afterward the eminent Scotch judge, was very partial to my Irish servant, Roger Rock, and Rock in return always described the larned dane as the very cleverest gintilman that Scotland had ever produced. A friend who was at my house one afternoon, when Mr. Robertson called, and was behind the scenes, described a laughable colloquy between the Dean of Faculty and Rock.

"Is your master at home, Rock?" "He is not, Mr. dane, but he is somewhere hard by. I hope I see you well, sor?" "Only so so, Rock; the hot weather knocks me up." "I doun't wonder, sor; it reminds me, sor, of the weather in the Houly City in the month of August" (Rock was a staunch Roman Catholic). "It creates thirst, great thirst, Rock." "It does, indeed, sor." "Rock." "Yes, sor." "What excellent claret that was we had here the other night?" "First-rate, yer honor." "If your master had been at home, I would have asked him to allow me to quench my thirst with some." "I can manage that for you, Mr. dane, as I have got a nice cool bottle that was left out last time, and master will be right glad to hear that yer honor got it." "Then, Rock, I shall walk up stairs; first, the claret." "Yes, sor." "Then a bottle of iced water; I know you can manage that." "All right, sor;" and the newspaper?" "After that, you need not disturb your master." "I shall have all with you, sor, immediatly." The moment after attending to the learned dane's wants, Rock returned to the gentleman, who had heard the feels-a-feels between them. "Sor, do you know who that gintilman is?" "Not exactly, Rock." "Why, sor, he is the dane of all the law in Scotland; and uch, sor, for an after-dinner spaich there never was such a gentilman; ounely, sor, gilt my master to tell you the story about the county of Pables (Peebles) and the dane—ounely doun't say, sor, I tould you."

This story, which tickled Rock's fancy, as many others of the learned dean's did, arose out of the following circumstance: Mr. Robertson was in London as counsel on some important appeal case from the Scotch courts to the House of Lords, in which one of our northern counties was interested—Sutherland, I think. The case had been before their lordship one or two days, and Mr. Robertson was to proceed in his argument the following forenoon. At a dinner-party at which I met the learned gentleman, there was present a bailie, or other magisterial magnate, from the county of Peebles; and, some allusion having been made to the case in which Mr. Robertson was engaged, the bailie remarked, "Ah, Mr. Robertson, there is no fear o' the county o' Sutherland not being attended to, but our wee county o' Peebles is just looked upon as a nonentity. You never hear o' the county o' Peebles nae mair than if it did nae belang to Scotland." "That is very wrang, bailie," said the learned Scotch advocate. "Oh, it's mair than wrang," said the bailie; "it's doun-right disgracefu!" "Well," said Mr. Robertson, "anything, bailie, I can do to bring the county of Peebles into notice, I beg to assure you, without any particular reference to its excellent trout-fishing, which should never be lost sight of, will afford me great pleasure and satisfaction."

A witty friend at the table asked the learned gentleman how he could bring the county of Peebles into notice. "Why, I shall satisfy you very soon on that head, and the bailie also, by making a beginning to-morrow. After what I have heard to-night, I shall consider it my duty, so long as it does not interfere with those interests which I now represent, to bring the county of Peebles under the especial attention of the Chancellor and the judges, as well as all the peers, lay and spiritual, who may be present. The bailie has made out a very strong case of grievance, and the sooner it is remedied the better."

The bailie was silent, and, if one could judge what was passing through his mind, I think he regretted that, in his patriotic desire to serve his native county, he had ever mentioned the subject. Our witty friend was still pressing to know precisely how our learned friend was to proceed in the Peebles affair next day in the House of Lords. "I shall take my own course in that," said the learned advocate, "but, if you will promise to give me whitebait at Greenwich on Saturday, I in return promise you, as I do my friend the bailie, to mention the county of Peebles twenty times to-morrow before the Lord Chancellor, and, before the week is out, the bailie, with his friends in Peeblesshire, will see by the Scotch newspapers that I fulfilled my promise." The bailie, so far as the claret and other good things permitted, was very grave at this intimation. Accordingly, next morning, when Mr. Robertson was about to resume his argument before the Chancellor, and seeing some of his friends of the previous evening present, he said to one of them, "I hold you responsible to keep a correct account of the number of times I mention the county of Peebles." He then began, and had not proceeded in his speech more than five minutes, when he said: "My lords, I shall now put a hypothetical case. I shall suppose I am arguing this case before your lordships for the county of Peebles, and your lordships are aware—at least some of your lordships are—that the county of Peebles is in the south of Scotland, within a short distance of Edinburgh, the capital. The county of Peebles, my lords, is therefore differently circumstanced from the county of Sutherland, a northern county." The learned counsel kept constantly looking over his shoulder, and in something more than a whisper expressed a hope that he was taking a correct note of the numbers. At last his friend tapped the learned gentleman on the shoulder, and told him his whitebait for Saturday was safe, as he had mentioned the county of Peebles twenty-four times. "Honor bright!" "Honor bright," was the reply. The learned gentleman now concluded his argument without further reference to the county of Peebles, and on the Saturday enjoyed his whitebait much, telling the party that he had never won a Greenwich dinner so easily.—Mark Boyd's "Reminiscences of Fifty Years."

Pop's Darling.

Pop's darling is little, so little—so sly,
 A plump little darling, with pretty blue eye;
 And she's sitting and singing,
 Her tiny feet swinging,
 Yes, swinging on papa's desk, way up so high.
 She's a dear little darling, a bright sunny ray.
 And she's laughing the while—we are looking her way:
 Now cooing, now winking
 At Pop while he's thinking
 And writing of baby dear, swinging away.
 And thus in the evening sits baby up here,
 Sits singing and swinging—Pop's own little dear,
 Making work of a life-time
 One ray of bright sunshine,
 For all is contentment when baby is near.
 Now darling grows sleepy, keeps wake but in vain,
 And she lays her head where so often it has lain,
 Now she's nodding—nid-nodding,
 Some dreamy land plodding,
 And we soothe her to sleep till the morrow again.
 So here we sit musing—once more in the gloom—
 While the light flickers drearily pale in the room,
 Some fairy-land seeming,
 While thinking and dreaming
 Of little one's mother, low down in the tomb.

A Card from Joaquin Miller.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE N. Y. TRIBUNE—Sir: As I left England suddenly, barely saying good-bye to a few friends at hand, I have ever since felt like making some public expression of my gratitude to that country for its noble treatment of me and my crude "Songs of the Sierras," and as the American press has as a rule treated me with similar generosity, and as I am about to return for a time to the Sierras and my home on the Willamette, I take the occasion to briefly thank both countries together.

First, let me speak of England, for was she not first to speak of me? Looking back a few months to a venture that now seems to me like a dream, I am bound to say that the conduct of that country in holding up my hands when they were not strong, when in fact I had neither money, name nor influence, appears to me every day, as I recall it, manly and generous beyond calculation. England! the terms of the expression of thanks are threadbare. Permit me to say simply, I thank you! I stood by Niagara the other day and kissed my hand to Canada, and, with the experiences of the last six months rushing across my mind, I said, hat in hand, "England, I thank you!"

While the American press has been more cautious and qualified in its reviews, I believe, as a rule, it has been honest and well-meaning. England was treating with a stranger who appealed to her generosity, and so she refused to see faults while she could find any merits to commend. America, however, is anxious and concerned about her literature, and is ready to point out faults that they may be avoided in the future. At least, that is what the author of the severest criticism I have yet seen writes me, and I am ready to believe him. The public is full of good will. The sale of the book proves that, and I have nothing now to complain of. I shall return to the Sierras, and the pastoral banks of the Willamette, glad and grateful and with lifted face.

A few lines about Walker and Carson. General Walker, as a California lawyer, was a plain man in dress and manner. When he became President of Nicaragua he adopted the dress, manners and religion of the country. His eye was the most remarkable I ever saw—the keen, sharp flash of broken steel in the sun. If I have overdrawn his virtues, I do not regret it. I formed my estimate of the man when I had but little to love, and a little kindness went a long way. I believe, however, that investigation will prove that I am not far wrong in either his personal appearance or public life. "A tall man," I believe, in the old term, as used by poets, did not always imply a man of uncommon stature.

As Kit Carson was allowed to die in obscurity, without so much as a six-line paragraph to chronicle the event, it strikes me as a little strange that men now cry out against my attempt to preserve the memory of this truly brave and good man. No sincere, impartial man can read my allusions to Carson and say I have represented him as anything but a true man. The Indian girl is permitted to perish because it is in the order of things. She represents a race that is passing away. It would have been contrary to the order of things to have allowed her to escape. There is not one Indian in all my songs that survives, not one Indian woman that does not die a violent death, because this is as it is. I have done my work advisedly, such as it is, and if I have created a sympathy for the Indian girl that compels an outcry, it is surely more perfect than I had thought.

JOAQUIN C. H. MILLER.

Astor House, New York, Sept. 22d, 1871.

Court Chat.

— The Empress left England in better health and spirits than she has enjoyed ever since the great catastrophe. On embarking at Southampton she had resumed the old juvenile allures of Compiègne and Fontainebleau. Her Majesty was attired in black, with a pouf à la Titien, i. e., a skirt turned up in front and gathered in thick folds behind, over a flounced petticoat, the whole fully trimmed with fringe and velvet. She carried in her left hand a small green parasol, and in the right one of those long sarbacane canes which she introduced at Biarritz some three or four years ago, reaching about a foot above her head. A little funny round hat, with a deep scarf of black lace surrounding the crown, and falling down the back, with a bunch of small feathers in front, formed the whole of her costume; and were it not that the face is much aged, and the hair unmistakably submitted to dye, but little change would be apparent. In the figure there is none. Her Majesty is much thinner, but preserves the activity and even grace of youth in her movements. Her Majesty has wisely discarded the fashion of much paint. But why do the ladies of her suite persist in hiding their beauty behind so thick a mask of red and white and blue? Nay, even orange color is now used underneath the eyes.

— On the occasion of the visit of her Majesty and the Prince Consort to Paris, strict orders were issued respecting the admission of strangers to the Park of St. Cloud during the promenade of the Imperial and Royal party. Amongst the select few was the late most popular vocalist, Signor Lablache. His remarkable person immediately caught the eye of the Emperor, who is said to have exclaimed, "There is Lablache! I only know him by sight. I should like to speak to him." And the Queen and Prince Albert being well acquainted with him, one of the gentlemen in attendance was sent for him. After presentation, the Emperor said, "You have a son, I believe, in my army?" "I have, sire." "What is his rank?" "He is a sous-lieutenant in the — Regiment, sire." The Emperor of the French turned to the Queen of England and said, "Would not your Majesty like to make Lablache's son a captain?"—and a captain, of course, he became.—Recollections by Planché, in London Society.

— Lord Seaforth, who was born deaf and dumb, was to dine one day with Lord Melville. Just before the time of the company's arrival, Lady Melville sent into the drawing-room a lady of her acquaintance who could talk with her fingers to dumb people, that she might receive Lord Seaforth. Presently Lord Guilford entered the room, and the lady, taking him for Lord Seaforth, began to ply her fingers very nimbly; Lord Guilford did the same, and they had been carrying on a conversation in this manner for about ten minutes, when Lady Melville joined them. Her female friend immediately said, "Well, I have been talking away to this dumb man." "Dumb!" cried Lord Guilford; "bless me, I thought you were dumb!"

— The King of Spain rises every day at six, the Queen at seven. Both occupy themselves in reading the papers of all colors, including Republican and Carlist. At ten o'clock they breakfast; never more than four platos or courses, including fruit. At five they dine, and the dinner consists of but six platos, including dessert. No more than an hour at the outside is spent over dinner, no matter who is there.

— The Emperor Napoleon, who is traveling as the Comte de Pierrefons, accompanied by the Prince Imperial, Prince Murat, Dr. Conneau, and suite, were at Torquay received by Sir Lawrence Palk, lord of the manor, and his son, Mr. Palk. The Imperial party were heartily cheered as they drove to the Imperial Hotel, where, it is understood, they intend to remain for about a month.

— The great fountain of the Chateau d'Eau is about to be reconstructed. The idea has been suggested of replacing the lions by a colossal statue of Jules Favre, from whose eyes a perpetual torrent would pour down, and fill the basin in one continued stream. The inscription to be, "Not an inch of our territory nor a stone of our fortresses," etc.; and underneath, "Aux armes, citoyens!"

— Two marriages in high life are announced—one between the Prince de Broglie, Secretary of Embassy at London, and Mdlle. Pauline-Louise, daughter of Count de la Forest d'Armaillé; and the other between M. Nathan-James de Rothschild, son of Baron Nathaniel, and advocate at the Paris bar, and Mdlle. Louise Theresa de Rothschild, daughter of Baron Meyer-Charles.

— In accordance with a desire expressed by the Queen, sketches are being prepared for her Majesty of Killiney Hill, which, with the castle, etc., will be sold next March. The impression is very strong in certain quarters that the beautiful hill will be purchased on behalf of the Queen for the purpose of establishing a Royal residence there.—Saunders' News Letter.

— The Prince Imperial of France will, it is said, follow the example of the young Italian Duke at Harrow, and join one of the English public schools. He has the reputation of being as fond of his books as Prince Leopold, and according to some people the two Princes are becoming quite fond of each other.

— The Empress Eugénie has arrived at Lisbon, and was visited at the Central Hotel by the King and Queen and Don Fernando. The Empress afterwards left by rail for Madrid.

— The Duke d'Aumale intends to pass the winter in Paris, and has purchased the residence of M. Fould, in the Faubourg St. Honoré.

— The Duke of Edinburgh's elephant has been presented by his Royal Highness to the Dublin Zoological Gardens.

HON. THOMAS H. SELBY.

ON Monday, December 4th, 1871, the official term of the HON. THOMAS H. SELBY, as Mayor of San Francisco, came to a close with the inauguration of his successor, the Hon. William Alvord. The retiring Chief Magistrate, whose portrait appears in our present number, took leave of the Board of Supervisors, with whom, as their President, he had been so long associated, in a valedictory, hereto appended, quite in harmony with his character and well-known progressive ideas, and which, for the cheerful outlook it opens as to the future of the city, will place us in the best light abroad. Among the audience were some early Californians, who recalled to mind that on the evening of December 4, 1851, Mr. Selby, the youngest member of the then Board of Assistant Aldermen, was chosen President of that body—the present occasion exactly and appropriately completing the round twenty years, during which, in several public capacities, he has faithfully served the city. As we propose to introduce Mr. Alvord to our readers hereafter, with a portrait and biographical sketch, a more detailed allusion to the Mayor elect will not now be necessary, unless we remark that the two gentlemen are intimate friends, both New Yorkers, both having been identified with the progress of San Francisco from its infancy, while in both instances the office sought the man. The familiar greeting which the two merchant-Mayors exchanged, as the one conducted the other to the Chair, gives assurance that the executive power, in passing from the hands which have held it for two years, goes into those of a worthy successor.

As we predicted at the outset, Mr. Selby's good influence has been felt from the day of his inauguration. The record is all that could be desired, and the city shares in the luster of the man whom all parties united to place in power. He retires with a popularity and a reputation for administrative vigor and statesmanlike views not confined to the city he has benefited, but extending throughout California. Something more, however, than a mere passing allusion seems to be called for in noticing the closing up of this term, since the late incumbent has left the impress of his character on the politics of the State.

The Fall elections of 1869, when Mr. Selby was chosen Mayor, may be regarded as a turning point in the political history of California. The dominant party was at that time supreme in State and City, controlling the offices, dispensing the patronage, flushed with recent victories and visions of continued power. Such was its prestige that as the time approached for nominating an Independent Tax-Payers' candidate—this being the first campaign of that Reform Party—its Convention met without enthusiasm and with but faint expectation of success. No prominent man seemed willing to accept the position of standard-bearer and be the hero of almost certain defeat. After canvassing the chances in connection with the best names, the case looked hopeless, unless the weight of character and popularity of Mr. Selby could be placed at the head of the ticket. Having been nominated by acclamation, his repeated refusals were met by persistent argument, both by the Committee appointed to confer with him and by the most prominent citizens, until the point was carried. The wisdom of the nomination was soon apparent, and it was generally admitted that any other candidate would have been disastrously defeated. As it was, the general Democratic ticket, with this and one other exception, was elected by an average majority of about three thousand. The effect of the election of Mr. Selby was electrical. It was the first step in the movement which revolutionized the whole State, broke up the corrupt political "Ring" in San Francisco, and gave heart to the Republicans everywhere by showing that their opponents were not wholly invulnerable.

Upon taking his seat as Mayor, Mr. Selby seems to have adopted a line of conduct for his guidance from which, we believe, he has never swerved. It was quickly seen that a firm hand was at the helm, and that neither political, moneyed nor social influence would have any weight in shaping his opinions or directing his action. Elected by voters from all political creeds, he could exercise an independent policy without being hampered by partisan ties. His entire freedom in this respect was regarded by politicians as a refreshing though strange anomaly in official usage. During his term the veto power was used against some twenty measures, among them the resolution involving the issuance of $6,000,000 of city bonds to the Lake Tahoe Water Company, and numerous others for the expenditure of sums from $500 to $30,000 in aid of private interests and special projects. In every one of these his objections were so clearly and candidly expressed, and so founded in reason and justice, that he was sustained by the Board and applauded by the press and the public. The same independent spirit governed his police appointments, which were made exclusively on considerations of personal fitness and character, and with regard for the efficiency of the department. It is well known that during his entire term he was not absent from any meeting of the Boards of which the Mayor is ex officio the presiding officer, including the Board of Supervisors, the Police Commissioners, the Board of Health, and numerous subordinate bodies connected with the municipal system. At the meetings of the Board of Supervisors Mayor Selby has presided with dignity and watchfulness; and that he has been perfectly impartial, is shown by the cordial personal relations existing between the members and himself. Scrupulous as a business man, he brought to the management of city affairs his accustomed thoroughness, and was never satisfied until he had familiarized himself with whatever concerned the trusts confided to him, generally making a personal examination of the locality of important street and other improvements, and speedily obtaining an exact knowledge of the public finances and requirements. In deciding questions involving the welfare of the city he has never vacillated nor consulted popularity; and his views have stood the test of time to prove their correctness. The people of San Francisco will long remember his unselfish devotion to their welfare; and that his services have been unselfishly rendered, were proof necessary, is shown by the fact that he has never touched a dollar of the public money, having donated his salary as Mayor to deserving charities—the whole amount having been divided at the close of each year among some twenty of the Relief Associations and Benevolent Societies of the city. The labor involved has never prevented his patiently inspecting every demand on the treasury, however small, with the same care as if the bills were against himself. Undoubtedly a purer and higher political sentiment is created under such an influence, and in this point of view the actual cash gain to the city is not the only benefit reaped by the example of an executive thus conscientiously discharging his duties and exacting the same fidelity from others.

It was natural that at the approach of the State elections in 1871 Mr. Selby should be mentioned for Governor of California. In San Francisco it was felt that he was the strongest candidate whom the Republicans could put forward, drawing to himself, as he would, elements from all parties, who knew the keen-sighted intelligence and conservative sterling character of the man. What was at first casually hinted at, soon came to be accepted as a certainty. The press of the city advocated his nomination as especially fitting, and journals in all parts of the State catching the enthusiasm, became his earnest supporters. In these movements Mr. Selby took no part, merely intimating to those who addressed him on the subject that if it appeared that such was the wish of the people he would accept the nomination, believing he could carry the election by a heavy majority, and that the reforms which he had effected in municipal affairs, could be carried into those of the State. At the June primaries in San Francisco Selby delegations were triumphantly chosen from every Ward to the State Convention. It was an unanimous indorsement and mark of confidence by his fellow citizens of which any man might be proud. The enthusiasm was unbounded, and the event was regarded by all parties as conclusive. On his arrival at Sacramento, however, becoming satisfied that he lacked the requisite strength in the interior counties, where he had permitted none of the usual efforts to be made in his behalf, he caused his name to be withdrawn and retired from the field, positively refusing to allow his name to be balloted for. The decisive promptness of this action, removing as it did the last fear of divisions in the party, was received with tremendous applause. The Republican nomination for Congress was immediately tendered him by acclamation in the Congressional Convention at San Francisco, but was declined.

For several months the name of Mr. Selby had been associated with the United States Senatorship. He was not a seeker after the position, but it may be supposed that a worthy ambition to fill a place so exalted, and which has been the aspiration of so many, turned him momentarily aside from his settled distaste for official station. The moment the possibility of such an event began to be spoken of, men of all parties saw its eminent fitness; and before he had arrived at any decision himself as to its effect upon his extensive business relations, he found himself popularly regarded as the successful man. The close rivalry between the two especially prominent aspirants left the field open to this powerful compromise candidate, who had only to formally enter the list with his characteristic energy to attain the distinguished honor. It was at this point that his aversion to further public position finally mastered every other consideration. His official experience, however creditable to him, and acceptable to the people, raised no pleasing anticipations of six years of political service, which would break in upon his business habits and delay important projects which he had long had in view. Therefore, just prior to the meeting of the Legislature, he notified the friends who had been actively interesting themselves in his behalf, that he could not, under any circumstances, accept; and with that decision, having now declined a re-election as Mayor, and the nomination for Congress, he withdrew from the candidature. This determination was received with regret, for it was felt that weight of character and connections in the Atlantic States would have signalized his usefulness as Senator in advancing the interests of this coast, particularly those of commerce, manufactures and mining, in which he is so extensively engaged; while many whose ambition for him went further than his own had thought of even higher honors as among the possibilities of the future.

Were Mr. Selby more mindful of such matters it could be shown, as we happen to know, that he inherits his peculiar traits of character through a long ancestral line. The name reaches into remote English history, in counsel and war, and is inscribed among the memorial tablets of Westminster Abbey. In the ancient Yorkshire town of that name, Selby Abbey was founded by William the Conqueror in 1069. The present estates of the Selbys, situated principally in Northumberland and Kent, date from the reign of Edward the First, and the family have figured for hundreds of years in English military and naval annals, and in the Parliament, the Bench and the Clergy. The American branch, settling at Anapolis in the seventeenth century, were Magistrates in Colonial times, extensive land-holders, and have always been politically prominent, especially during the Revolution, when, in 1776, they were instrumental in establishing the new form of government in Maryland, served during the war and exerted their influence in maintaining the authority of Congress in counties of which the inhabitants were chiefly Loyalists. Early in the present century, Captain John Selby, the father of our Mayor, went to New York, where he married, and in the war of 1812 was noted for his daring maritime adventures. He died a few years since at a very great age, one of the old school of American merchant ship-masters, who carried the flag of our young Republic into distant seas amid trials and perils peculiar to those early times.

The same adventurous spirit and love of grappling with difficulties which has distinguished his race for many generations is exemplified in the subject of the present sketch, which, as a mere outline of an active and useful career, has scarcely touched upon events closely connected with the development of California. Indomitable energy characterizes all his undertakings. Whatever he does is typical of breadth and force. A merchant, he has been for twenty years a recognized power on the Pacific Coast. A man of progress, he creates industries and throws millions of dollars into the channels of trade. A philanthropist, he is foremost in charitable and educational plans. An originator and builder, he gives employment to thousands.

That a man in vigorous health, assured social position, a thorough knowledge of California and its wants, remarkable executive ability, an immense and increasing business so systematized as to admit of its being conducted by experienced subordinates, in short, with all that is supposed to make life enjoyable, should decline one after another the official preferments which have been tendered him, may seem unaccountable. But in this Mr. Selby acted with his usual good judgment. It was these very circumstances which reminded him of the value of home and the tranquility and the personal independence which crowns the prosperous merchant, but is unknown to the politician. He is the wisest philosopher who extracts from life as it passes all that it contains of rational pleasures. A conscientious worker, and a lover of work for itself, Mr. Selby knows how to enjoy life, and practically illustrates his tastes in that respect—holding the reins over some of the finest stock in the State, of his own raising, and, in occasional hunts, keeping bright his skill with shot-gun and rifle. With a cheerful, sunny disposition, ready conversational powers, based on a liberal education, habits of observation and a keen appreciation of humor, he is possessed of the personal magnetism which attracts friends, and is the hospitable entertainer both at his farm at Fair Oaks and at his city residence.

Our limits would forbid more than a brief glance at the enterprises by which, singly and unaided, and during a period of commercial stagnation, Mr. Selby has not only driven out Eastern and foreign competition, but boldly invades the old established centers of industry, freighting ships with products of California labor and making the nation our customers. The object of this sketch is to present him as the type of the American merchant; of those who give vitality to our country and build up the national wealth and prosperity.

MAYOR SELBY'S ADDRESS.

Gentlemen of the Board of Supervisors:—The time prescribed by law has arrived which relieves a portion of our Municipal Government from duty and inaugurates those in whose hands the people have chosen to repose the trust. Although the retiring Mayor is not required to furnish a review of public affairs, and the very complete statements contained in the published annual reports by the heads of the several departments render needless any detailed allusion to the subjects therein contained, I may be permitted to detain you with some remarks which are suggested at the close of my official term.

REVISION OF THE CHARTER—LOCAL ELECTIONS.

At the approaching session of the Legislature, a number of important modifications in our form of local government will be considered. The Charter, framed when the city contained one-half of its present population, is no longer suited to the public requirements. It is desirable that whatever remodeling is attempted should embrace a restoration of Municipal self-government and a relief from injurious meddling in our local affairs by the Legislature, which, while exercising its rightful sovereign authority in creating the municipal body, parted with rights of a purely local character, which are necessarily vested in the city. Infringements upon these have wrought grievous damage to our citizens. Recent judicial opinions have decided that this interference, in some instances, is unconstitutional, and encouragement is thus given for a revision, under which some guarantee may be had against further ruinous enactments.

All interests and the best elements of society have long been united as to the necessity of a change in the manner of our local elections, not only as to the relationship of the several Wards to each other, so that every Supervisor may be voted for by the people at large, but also in the election of the legislative delegation, which, under the late census will be largely increased. As regards the former, it seems reasonable that a Supervisor who may vote upon measures affecting the property of all the tax-payers should be subjected to their suffrages and become responsible to every voter in the city. The disgraceful colonizing from Ward to Ward would thus be prevented and a higher political standard be enforced.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS—WATER SUPPLY.

A kindred subject is that relating to the establishment of a Board of Works, which, under the guidance of practical scientific ability, should originate and recommend the changing of established grades and other important street improvements, and especially have control of the subject of sewerage, upon which, more than all else, the public health depends. Street work should be passed upon by this advisory body before going to the Board of Supervisors—the former to recommend to the latter whatever public improvements they may deem necessary, and the Board of Supervisors to enact them if they think proper, by a Resolution of Intention requiring the Mayor's approval. The Mayor could stop at any measure which might inadvertently have passed both Boards, or prove, upon closer examination, to be injurious to a majority of interests. Three distinct checks would thus be placed upon all public work, and afford property owners a sufficient protection against hasty and unwise legislation. The whole subject of an increased water supply ought to be submitted to the Board of Works, with the view of making it a public enterprise to be owned by the city, so that the people may have an unrestricted use of water without price, other than the tax required to build the works and keep them in order; and I am gratified to state that a further examination of the resources of San Mateo County has fully established the fact that enough water can be obtained on this peninsula to supply the city, for all purposes, for many years. A Board of Works vested with such powers would incur heavy responsibilities. It should also absorb several of the Commissions created by the last Legislature, and work a repeal of the onerous law passed at the same session for the prosecution of delinquent street assessments, which has not only verified in practice all the evils predicted of it, but has not subverted the interests even of those in whose special behalf it was supposed to have been enacted. Great cities in Europe and America have been benefited by their Boards of Public Works, and we have had ample time to avail of their experience to establish one for ourselves. Its usefulness would be measured by the character of its material. In unscrupulous hands it might defeat the very objects for which it is intended, and if converted into a political machine would prove a curse instead of a blessing. Municipal government, in whatever department—School, Fire, or Police—is not intended for the benefit of any particular party, but to be administered solely with reference to economy and the welfare of the people; and the soundness of the principle of separating local from national issues in our elections has been illustrated in the reforms effected under such a policy in this city, setting an example which has been imitated in a number of Eastern cities, with the best results.

STREET PAVEMENTS.

One of the heaviest items of expense, both present and prospective, is the pavement of streets. I would recommend an entire discontinuance of wooden pavement until an intelligent report can be prepared by disinterested parties on the pavements already laid, as regards economy and durability, and a comparison be made with other inventions as to merit. The Street Department appropriation for the present fiscal year amounts to $160,000. This relates to public work only, and does not include the enormous sums paid by individual property holders, before the streets are in a condition to be accepted. So large an expenditure, and which soon must be doubled, as repairs are required on newly accepted streets, suggests that probably the city is not receiving the best work for the money. Wooden pavements of all kinds, once so popular, are growing into disfavor the more they are tested. The inducements for fraud in furnishing the material are so great that it is doubtful if they can ever be overcome by the utmost watchfulness. Even the best wooden pavements are liable to swell and contract in wet or dry weather, and the law requiring the use of black-heart redwood is constantly violated by contractors. I am disposed to think that the substitution of cobble stones in some localities may be found advisable. I would certainly recommend the artificial stone in preference to wooden pavement of any kind, it being proof against decay and not liable to swell or shrink. Much of the prejudice against cobble stone pavement can be removed if the stones are selected with care and properly laid, owing to its durability and the cheapness with which it can be repaired—the cost of relaying it being only one-eighth of that of restoring wooden pavement. There has been a gratifying decrease in the street work awarded. During the fiscal year ending in 1871, the actual falling off was $1,000,000 from the average amount of the three preceding years. The city has now two hundred and thirty-two blocks of accepted streets to keep in order, about equally divided between wooden and cobble stone pavements, excepting a few blocks of artificial stone. I do not think we are fully alive to the danger which menaces the city in this matter of pavements. The alarming expenditures which have been and are still being made in that department demands the most careful consideration before we proceed any further, or the credit of the city may be swamped under the heavy burthen.

ASSESSMENTS—REGISTRATION EXPENSES.

The present plan of assessing property is anything but satisfactory to the taxpayers, as it is liable to favoritism and fraud. I am satisfied that the safeguards placed by law around this important trust are not adequate to its responsibilities. The duties might be more acceptably discharged, as is the case in some well-governed Eastern cities, by a Board of Assessors, to be chosen at the annual elections.

An unnecessary amount of money is also expended in registration services. The whole of the present complicated system held in the different Wards, and which has cost this year about $50,000, might be transacted at the office of the County Clerk for about $10,000, to be in charge of a Deputy especially employed for the purpose. The books would thus be open to the public all the year, instead of at brief periods just prior to elections, as at present. Every person would know where to go to be registered, enrolled and transferred, confusion would be avoided, and the moral effect of the change would be generally experienced. These and other much needed reforms will meet the earnest wishes of our citizens, and, it may be supposed, will, if introduced, not be rejected by the Legislature.

SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.

At this time the Sanitary condition of the city demands more than ordinary care. Public opinion will sanction any reasonable expenditure to provide for the cleanliness of streets and sewers, and to preserve the purity of the air we breathe. Neither quarantine, nor other prevention, however rigidly enforced, can be expected to entirely shield us from the approach of cholera, to which we are exposed by railroad communication as well as by sea. We must therefore use every means in our power to make its probable visit here next year as light as possible. Two years ago, I suggested that the sewers might be flushed from reservoirs constructed on the hills, to be filled from the bay by pumping; and in a subsequent correspondence with General Alexander on the subject, that distinguished engineer favored the idea as practicable and advisable in the lack of a sufficient supply of fresh water for such purpose. This, or some other expedient, should be adopted for cleansing the sewers, which are a prolific source of disease, and, in the lower streets along the water-front, are often choked up by the tides, and their contents forced back upon the city. The cess-pools at the street corners should be kept filled with water to prevent the escape of effluvia, and the strictest surveillance exercised over all the private sewers and drains connected with the main sewers, to see that they are properly trapped and kept in good order. The winds, the winter rains, and other natural purifying agencies, have been principally relied on for protection, but these should not lead us to neglect the precautions placed within our reach by science and experience.

FIRE LIMITS—THE PUBLIC RECORDS.

Without a more rigid observance of the law prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within the fire limits, the warning furnished by the calamity at Chicago will have been lost upon us. I have repeatedly urged that the Ordinance might be impartially enforced as a measure of public safety, made especially necessary by the high winds and prolonged dry season of our climate. The destruction of the public records of real estate at Chicago also suggests the necessity of greater security for our own records, which are deposited in a building forming part of a block by no means fire-proof. A suitable Hall of Records ought to be erected forthwith, to be located near the site of the proposed new City Hall, but to be sufficiently isolated, and built exclusively of stone, brick and iron. It is needless to picture the confusion which would ensue were those records to be destroyed. Titles to real estate might remain in litigation for years after such a disaster, and permanent injury be inflicted on the public prosperity.

OUTSIDE LANDS AND DEEDS.

By Act of the last Legislature, the Mayor is authorized to execute deeds of conveyance of the city's title to outside lands relinquished by Act of Congress to the city, in trust, to be conveyed to parties who were then in possession; as also to lands ceded to the city from the Black Point Military Reservation, in trust for those who occupied them when the Reservation was extended. In pursuance of this duty, I have made 960 deeds to parties proving their claims before the Outside Land Committee. In many cases the Mayor has been enjoined, and great care has been necessary to justly discriminate between conflicting claimants. The above number of deeds does not represent the full number of blocks and subdivisions deeded. While in some instances only fractions of a single block are named, in others, twenty, fifty, and even a hundred are conveyed to a single person. There are now remaining at this office only ten deeds, against the signing of which, protests have been filed. The aggregate value of the outside lands has already been very largely increased by this settlement of title. Greater stability has been given to property values, taxation has been equalized, and additional inducements are offered to make permanent improvements. I have had a carefully prepared collection of maps and diagrams of the public property bound and placed on file in the Mayor's office for reference. Of these public lands, 1,376 acres were relinquished to the city as above, and are divided into parks, cemeteries, and school, engine and hospital lots, some of which are now being improved for those purposes. These reservations should be fenced as soon as practicable, to protect them against squatters, and to avoid litigation.

THE PUBLIC CHARITIES.

Our Municipal charities are subjected to abuses which call for Legislative remedy. In a city remarkably healthy there are usually at the Alms House and Hospital upward of six hundred inmates, a large proportion of whom have no claim here for relief. The climate of San Francisco, and its location as the terminus of railroad and steamship lines, cause it to be selected as a general asylum; and paupers and indigent sick are continually arriving from other counties, and are thrown upon this city for support. Among the plans for the relief of our tax-payers in this respect, it has been suggested that a State Hospital and Alms House be established in some healthful locality, to be open to patients from every county. An appropriation from the State to be applied to the Hospital Fund of San Francisco might at least be made, in order to equalize this heavy tax. Unfortunates brought here cannot be left to perish; but while charity prompts us to relieve suffering humanity, justice protests against this city being compelled to carry unaided a burthen which should be borne by the State at large.

MANUFACTURES AND COMMERCE.

The dullness in trade, which has been felt in every sea port in the country, may, in our case, be traceable as much to local as to national causes. Within a few years great changes have taken place in our business relations. Eastern communities have come into competition with us by the completion of railroads. Mining is no longer a Californian specialty with this city as its only point of supplies. The whole State is becoming more impressed with the necessity of fostering manufactures and commerce. In the former we are successfully rivaling older communities in many articles of home manufacture, and competing with them to supply the wants of the vast populations bordering on the Pacific. The fact that the foundries, factories and workshops of San Francisco are at present filling orders from all the States of the Pacific slope, and from South America, Mexico, British Columbia and Asia, indicates the importance into which our manufactures have grown. These demands for the products of our skilled labor from so many directions, point to those regions as inexhaustible markets in the future. The geographical position and great harbor of San Francisco tend to bring commerce here, and to that end there should be a reduction to a merely nominal figure of wharfage and all port charges and harbor dues. Costly wharves and docks will avail us little if we do not by every means in our power tempt shipping to make use of them. The employments connected with ships and wharves have for some time formed the notable exception to our industrial activity. By removing the exactions which hamper commerce, and which have made this one of the most expensive ports in the world, we would attract vessels to our harbor, thus cheapening freights and enabling the farmer to realize larger profits on his produce. The present seems to be a propitious moment. The business of the American sea coast on the Pacific, from Panama to British Columbia, is setting more strongly in this direction. The decided tendency of commerce to this harbor has been observed throughout the mercantile world. Additional steamships are now being built for the China line, and the departures are soon to be semi-monthly. Shipments of Australian wool, which have hitherto reached the American consumer via England, are seeking the more direct way of San Francisco. A line of first-class steamers, it is believed, would secure a portion of the commerce of Australia and New Zealand, as well as their mail service and passenger travel. The safety of the voyage and the healthy climate through the whole route would add greatly to its attractiveness and popularity. The tea trade, with its collateral industries, is adopting this in preference to other routes. Large consignments of teas and silks have been landed in Europe via San Francisco in less time than is possible by the Suez route, and our Atlantic cities are supplied two or three months earlier than by the old way. Sailing vessels are beginning to be used in the transportation of tea cargoes to this port. The bulk of the commerce of Eastern Asia belongs legitimately to San Francisco, which, as the nearest American seaport, is its natural highway and port of entry; and every form of industry in California and on this coast is directly interested in enabling us to make use of these natural advantages, and in procuring favorable legislation by Congress for that purpose. We must have telegraph cables to connect California with the Asiatic nations; and additional lines of American steamships, with Government subsidies, plying between San Francisco and the great marts of trade. The United States could well afford to pay $5,000,000 annually, to first-class steamers to build up the commerce of the Pacific, thus enriching the whole nation. By adopting this policy, England has secured the carrying trade of the Atlantic; and so deeply impressed are the Colonies of New Zealand and Australia with the importance of our commerce, that the former has subsidized an American line of steamships, and the latter has voted a subsidy contingent upon similar action by our Government. These measures are not sectional, nor limited to any particular interest; they would give an impulse to trade throughout the United States. They are national in their bearing, and deserve general support as a large stride toward the restoration of our decayed American shipping.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

A grand continental enterprise, in which St. Louis and San Francisco are especially interested, is enlisting the combined efforts of their capitalists. The completion of the Pacific Railroad on the thirty-fifth parallel is one of the necessities of the times. "The trade of the East," which nations have contended for, and the acquisition or loss of which has for ages marked their rise or decline, is concentrating at San Francisco to supply America and Western Europe. Even now it forms an important part of the business of the railroad, and when the whole trade of the Pacific shall have adopted this as its port of entry, as must infallibly be the case, additional carrying facilities will be required. The latest Congressional Report on Commerce and Navigation shows that the merchandise annually imported into the United States from countries which will ultimately become tributaries to the commerce of San Francisco, amounts in value to $100,000,000. That trade is steadily growing, and it seems clear that as the increasing transportation of California produce is added to the above, the Central Pacific Road will have more business than it can accommodate. The shipments of Australian wool amount in weight to 200,000,000 pounds per annum. A portion of this must eventually pass through San Francisco on its way to the American and English markets. It is then the duty and interest of our citizens to move toward building another railroad, by a shorter route, direct to St. Louis. There is every inducement for the immediate prosecution of the enterprise. Several hundred miles are already built from St. Louis westward.

BUSINESS PROSPECTS OF RAILROADS.

An idea of the probable business that will soon be done eastward over the Pacific Railroads, may be formed upon what is already known. For the two months of September and October last, the amount of tea forwarded by the Central Pacific was 7,587,536 pounds, against 473,585 pounds for the corresponding months in 1870. In the same two months the road also carried eastward 1,225,815 pounds of coffee. In the month of October, which is the last for which full returns of railroad exports have been prepared, 10,495,227 pounds of freight of all kinds were forwarded by rail from California, the leading articles of which were tea, coffee, hides, leather, hops, fish, fruits, silk, wine and wool. At that rate the present railroad freights eastward, of Asiatic and American produce, would amount to 125,942,724 pounds, equal to 62,971 tons per annum. What it would amount to under the increased commercial facilities which we have every reason to expect, it would be impossible to calculate. The relationship of the several Atlantic seaports to the railroad business and commerce of the Eastern States, differs from that of San Francisco to the immense region lying west of the Rocky Mountains, for which this must ever remain the great shipping point on the Pacific coast. The merchants and the press of the Atlantic cities now concede that the commerce that once flowed to them by the way of the Cape, has reversed its course, and that the trade of the Orient must henceforth pass through the Golden Gate. Fully appreciating the great work that the Central Pacific Railroad is engaged in, and not sympathizing with the prejudice against railroads, which enterprises have built up our Western States, I am confident that when additional lines of steamships shall be established on this ocean, with liberal subsidies, a single railroad will be unable to accommodate the business that will be thrown upon our coast, without taking into account lines of British steamships which will probably be running between San Francisco and Asiatic countries. As is the case with all healthy competition, the traffic of the present road would be rather increased than lessened. One steamer has recently landed a cargo of 3,300 tons of tea from China and Japan at this port, weighing 2,640,000 pounds net, or one-sixteenth of the entire annual consumption of tea in the United States; and tea trains overland are becoming so frequent as no longer to attract attention. The movement of other merchandise is in proportion. These facts, so plainly indicative of the future, are full of encouragement. St. Louis and San Francisco, whose interests in this respect are identical, should bend their energies to the building of a railroad between the two cities. St. Louis, connected by her river navigation with the great Northwest and the Gulf, is also the business center and natural dépôt for the distribution of East India and China goods through the valley of the Mississippi.

The results which will follow the completion of a railroad running south of the snow line between the chief city of the West and the seaport of the Pacific, are too obvious to require illustration. Passing through some of the best agricultural and mineral regions on the continent, it would shorten the distance and time from San Francisco to New York, opening to us new markets for our produce, manufactures and importations, and thereby building up an ever-increasing local business along the line of the road. Capital and energy in St. Louis, San Francisco and other great centers of wealth, are alive to the accomplishment of the enterprise, which may be considered as among the events of the near future.

THE NEW CITY HALL—INJURIOUS LEGISLATION.

While wealth and population have increased in the city, there has not been a proportionate lessening of the municipal taxation, which is now levied at the rate of nearly three dollars on the $100 of assessed property. By bringing to the management of public affairs the same rules of economy that we observe in our own, a reduction in this respect can be made. To effect this, however, every source of needless expenditure should be shut off. In retiring from office, I cannot neglect this opportunity to refer to the new City Hall on Yerba Buena Park. While I am always in favor of a liberal expenditure of money for enterprises of real public utility, I am opposed to taxing the people for the erection of these costly edifices which are more for glory than for use. In my opinion, a hall on the proposed scale, exceeding, as it will, that of any other American city, is unwarrantably extravagant. However conscientiously managed, it will have cost, when completed and furnished, several millions of dollars. The total bills of the Merchants' Exchange on California street amounted to $187,000; and, although a hall of that size would not answer all purposes, one which would meet the public necessities could be erected for $500,000, and would answer until, in a future generation, the city should have reached the position to require and warrant such a building as is now being constructed. At all events, a much less costly one than that proposed would be more in keeping with the existing heavy taxation. As regards this and other sources of needless taxation, it is clearly for the benefit of all California that San Francisco should be protected from injuries inflicted by illy advised legislation: for these burthens being a clog upon business, they react in the enhanced prices necessarily charged to the buyer and the consumer, whose factors and business agents we are. The interests of the sea-coast and the inland counties are inseparable, and only their common enemies would seek to create jealousy between them for selfish purposes. Hand-in-hand they will continue to advance—the prosperity of either directly benefiting and enriching the other. It is the misfortune of this city that many legislative measures of which we complain have originated with our own delerations, upon whom the responsibility should rest, rather than on members from distant counties who are not supposed to understand our wants as well as those especially selected to advocate them. We must look at home for the remedy. A delegation guarded against unworthy and selfish influences, and soon to be largely increased under the new apportionment, will constitute a protective power which no combination can afford to disregard.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE CITY.

Experience, though dearly purchased, has taught us much. A brief summary of the present, while it illustrates what has been accomplished, must be accepted as indicating continued progress. The population, numbering at least one hundred and sixty-five thousand, embracing all nationalities and creeds, have gathered in a little more than twenty years, while thousands from here have contributed to the growth of thriving cities and towns in neighboring counties. The corporate limits embrace an area of thirty-six square miles, having ten miles of available wharf frontage on the harbor. The buildings number over twenty thousand, exclusive of the Federal structures erected, or being built, and to which the Government will, it is believed, add others: for San Francisco, although only the tenth city in the Union in population, ranks fourth in maritime importance, having paid last year $8,000,000 into the Custom House. In the value of its commerce, this port is exceeded only by New York and New Orleans—the total amount of our foreign and domestic exports, in gold and produce, the last fiscal year, having been $64,000,000, of which $32,000,000 was foreign. The number of vessels arrived during the year from foreign and Atlantic ports and coastwise was 3,630. Six lines of ocean steamers connect us with the principal sea ports, north and south, and with China, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and the islands of the Pacific. During the last year we paid $13,000,000 in Federal taxes and duties, and our Internal Revenue tax is larger in proportion to the number of inhabitants than that of any other city in the United States. The total operations of the Branch Mint in San Francisco (where, since its establishment, $321,000,000 in gold and silver have been coined) amount to more than one-half of the entire coinage at the Philadelphia Mint since the organization of the United States Government. Occupying such a position, therefore, relatively to the national trade, finance and revenue, San Francisco may reasonably expect increased outlays by the Government. The Branch Mint, now being built, will be on a scale in keeping with the above figures. We also require larger and more commodious buildings for the United States Customs, Courts, Internal Revenue and other Federal purposes.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT AND INSTITUTIONS.

Our Common Schools, eighty-seven in number, are liberally supported: the expenditures of that Department, last year, having been upward of $700,000. There are forty-four large and substantial school houses belonging to the city, the remaining schools being held in rented premises. All are free from sectarian teachings, and are attended by 20,000 children. We have also sixty-three private and denominational schools, seminaries and colleges, attended by about 7,000 pupils. There are sixty-eight churches in the city, and eighty newspapers and periodicals daily, weekly and monthly are published here. A city which, not many years ago, was a by-word for violence and crime, is now noted for its progress in culture and refinement: the beauty and comfort of its homes: the variety and richness of its wares; the number of its literary and educational institutions, and its varied and thriving industries. The provident character of its people is seen by the great number who possess homesteads of their own, and in the substantial fact that the aggregate deposits in our savings banks amount to $35,000,000 in gold. The streets, roads and avenues improved by wood and cobble-stone pavements, macadamizing and plank-ing, measure 112 miles, and are lighted at night by 3,600 gas-lamps, at a cost of about $200,000 per annum. Under the thoroughfares, the pipes of the Water Company extend a distance of 125 miles, and there are forty miles of street railroads. Of carriages, omnibuses, cars and other licensed vehicles, there are 4,800, and probably as many private conveyances. The Funded Debt of the city at the end of the last fiscal year was $2,624,200; from which should be deducted $205,200, bonds of 1851, and $311,500, bonds redeemed by the Commissioners of 1851, and canceled by the Mayor September 19, 1871, leaving outstanding bonds to the amount of $3,106,500. Balance now in the Treasury to the credit of the Sinking Fund, $228,000, making the actual debt $2,878,500. Municipal taxes are collected on an assessment roll of $100,000,000, of real and personal property, realizing about $3,000,000, of which nearly one-third is for State purposes—San Francisco contributing a little less than one-half of the revenue of California. For the several public charities, including Alms House and Hospital, upward of $1,000,000 have been paid out of the City Treasury in the last five years. Of private relief and benevolent societies, several of them maintaining their own hospitals and asylums, we have about seventy, not counting subdivisions of orders.

THE FUTURE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

There never was a time so full of promise to the young, the prudent and the energetic, as the present. Business is receiving a renewed impulse. Increasing lines of railroads are opening new fields for the further extension of trade. The remarkable success which is attending cotton-growing, in some of our southern counties, foretells a new industry, destined to become one of the first in the State, both in the cultivation of that staple and in its manufacture in this city for home and foreign markets. San Francisco capital is being freely invested in railroad enterprises, the reclaiming of lands, the opening of mines, extensive projects of irrigation, ship-building, and whatever tends to fraternize the different sections of the State, and make them beneficial to each other. A favorable climate, subject to no extremes, invites and sustains the most diversified industry. The coming year, as regards agriculture and mining, which have already been quickened by the abundant and early rainfall, bids fair to be the most prosperous in the history of California. Seated at the gateway of the continent, and facing countries containing a third of the population of the globe, the commercial capital is assured of her position as one of the world's emporiums, if her people are only true to themselves. While practical intelligence is everywhere directed toward promoting the general interests of the State, it is for our citizens to contribute still more liberally to the same end, by stimulating manufacturing and other enterprises, and extending commercial intercourse, not only coastwise and abroad, but by an artificial highway to connect this peninsula with the main land, thereby establishing a direct and unbroken line of railroad to the farming counties and interior States, bringing ship and car together, and making San Francisco in fact, as well as in theory, the focus and western terminus of the continental railroad system. The amount of money we are lavishing on a City Hall would go far toward building such a bridge, which, resting on piers, at long intervals, could present no serious obstructions to the free ebb and flow of the tides. It depends on ourselves, whether or not the natural advantages which we enjoy, shall be made available in our time in achieving the great destiny to which the city must eventually attain.

In conclusion, gentlemen, permit me to say, that in severing my connection with the Board, it is with a deep sense of the cordial relations existing between the members and their presiding officer. In instances where orders and resolutions have been returned unapproved, it has been upon mature reflection and the belief that the public good would be thereby promoted. I have aimed to use the veto power impartially, and am gratified that your honorable body, upon a more careful revision, have sustained the Mayor in every such instance. My best wishes will always continue to be for the welfare of the community to whom we owe so much as citizens, and who have entrusted us with high responsibilities and duties.

I have now the pleasure of presenting to you my successor—a gentleman well-known to us all as having been associated, for many years, with the progress and business enterprises of San Francisco and of California, and for whom I need hardly bespeak a continuance of that friendly coöperation which has been so uniformly shown to myself.

Hotel Expenses and Cost of Living in San Francisco.

Now that a portion of the current of travel from China and Australasia to the United States and Europe has been diverted into a new channel by the establishment of regular steam communication, it would interest many to know the very moderate expenses incurred either in passing through or in sojourning a while in the city of San Francisco. We give, therefore, a brief statement of them, leaving the traveler to compare them with that of other places. In no city in the world is hotel accommodation of the same excellence to be obtained at so moderate a price. At the Occidental and Grand Hotels and at the Lick House unsurpassed board with comfortable quarters can be obtained for three dollars per diem. At the Cosmopolitan, one of the finest hotels in the United States, and at the Russ House, the expense is somewhat lower; while at the American Exchange and International Hotel board and lodging, with excellent table, can be had for from one dollar and a half to two dollars a day. If the traveler desires to economize, he can obtain a good bed-room for from three to four dollars per week, and can get meals at restaurants for from fifteen to fifty cents each, according to the dishes he selects. He can thus measure his wants by the length of his purse, and yet always obtain clean, well-cooked meals at a less cost than any city we have ever visited, either in the United States or Great Britain. To those who prefer a more lengthened stay and purpose going into housekeeping, we would say that provisions are very moderate in price: Beef, from 12 to 18 cents per pound, according to the joint; mutton, 10 to 12 cents; lamb, 12 to 15 cents; veal, 12 to 18 cents; pork, 12 to 15 cents; bacon, 20 cents; butter, 40 to 50 cents; flour, $1 50 to $2 per sack of 50 pounds; potatoes, 1½ to 3 cents per pound. All vegetables are cheap; when not in season there is, of course, an advance. Milk is 10 cents a quart; eggs, 40 cents per dozen. Dairy produce and poultry are the only things which rate higher than in the Eastern States. Of the fruits, they are at times in such abundance as hardly to pay the expense of bringing them to market. A six-roomed house in a respectable locality may be rented for from $20 to $25 per month and upward; one with eight or ten rooms, from $40; ten to twelve rooms, from $60. Traveling to and from suburban residences is not very expensive, however, car tickets being from 3 to 6½ cents each, and ferriage across the bay, to the most beautiful environs in the world, from 10 cents to 25. This, we think, concludes our list of necessities for a life in San Francisco. It is a city in which a man or a family may live as extravagantly as they may please, but where they can practice economy if they choose.

CALIFORNIA MAIL BAG.

The Sale of the Empress Eugénie's Personal Effects.

The following record of the above sale at the Louvre is from the pen of the special correspondent of the Daily News: In passing by the new galleries of the Louvre, facing the quay, I heard the tinkle of a bell, and the voice of a crier inviting the public to come in and buy what remained to be sold of the Empress Eugénie's personal effects. Accepting the invitation, I entered a long-vaulted chamber with a sanded-floor, which was occupied by old clothes sellers of both sexes, curiosity dealers, a few friends of the fallen dynasty whose faces I had often seen grouped around the throne of the Salle des États, some dirty students, a reporter of the Gaulois, attracted, like myself, by the noise of the bell, and a sprinkling of those antiquated gentlemen in white gaiters who pass their lives in hovering about the bookstands on the parapet of the Quay Voltaire and crossing and recrossing the Pont des Arts. The auctioneer was a self-sufficient sort of common-place bourgeois. He did his best to be jocular at the expense of fallen greatness. In liquidating the Imperial effects he was assisted by an old clerk, two men wearing threadbare Imperial liveries, and a strong-voiced valuer, who, contrary to the traditions of Paris auctioneers, puffed the wares he wanted to vend. To some he attempted to give a historical value. Each article he seemed to think was worth its weight in gold, if only as a relic. The dresses, laces, shawls, and mantles, had been disposed of on a previous day; and it was now the turn of the underclothing and "intimate house linen" to be liquidated. Pillow-cases of fine cambric—so fine that one wonders how they supported the elaborate embroideries and deep real lace borders—were hotly contested for by a "petite dame," a shabby Jew of the Rue des Victoires, and a party of buyers belonging, I should say, to the Quartier Breda. The little lady carried off a dozen. It "poses" one, she cried, tittering as she spoke, to press the pillow on which an Imperial head reposed. The cipher E happened to stand for her name, which she volunteered to tell one of the old friends of the fallen dynasty was Eulalie. As for the crown under it, ma foi, she was just as worthy to wear it as any one else! The old friend was not loth to cultivate the acquaintance of the sparkling fair one. He assented to this proposition, and volunteered to hold a pillow-case which the auctioneer had allowed her to take. The toveling was endless. Bundle after bundle of fine Saxony damask napkins, all with the E, the crown, the eagle, the busy Carolingian bee, and a profusion of laurel wreaths, were handed round the vaulted room to be examined by bidders and then disposed of. Some breakfast-table napery, the present of a king, now Emperor William's first feudatory, was bought by one of the former habitués of the Salles des États. He got it cheap. One of the old gentlemen, who happened to be deaf, was furious when he found that he might have had the lot at 130 francs. I do not know why the brokers and students were so jocose when an inside garment was held up by two dainty little sleeves, and the public asked to examine it, as a fair specimen of the large bale from which it was drawn at hazard. American modesty cannot bring itself to name this garment any more than it can to speak of a shirt. If Paul de Cassagnac were as good as his oft-repeated oath, he would have run his sword-cane through the profane auctioneer's showman who held the article in question up to be scoffed at by the males and admired by the women. There were peignoirs and dressing-gowns, clearly furnished by Chapon, the famous ladies' outfitter in the Rue de la Paix, and all wonderfully elegant, but dusty and somewhat blue-molded. The stockings of thread, silk, and Shetland wool, were of gossamer lightness. An infinity of bath and toilet sponges were knocked down at a hundred francs. They were all of the best quality. The little lady said she would have been the purchaser if the auctioneer had guaranteed that he was selling her something which had actually passed through the Empress' hands. As for the boots and slippers, they justified the eulogiums passed by MM. Franc and Lockroy in their report on Parisian shoemakers. Then there were, the ladies thought, delicious things in the way of petticoats, flannel bustles, robes de chambre, sorties de bain, and woollen wraps. Some baby's robes which, according to the salesman's legend, belonged to the Prince Imperial's layette, were bought by a Russian lady. A snuffy purchaser near me shook her head incredulously at those belongings of Imperial infancy. They were sumptuously got up, she admitted, but nothing would convince her that they did not belong to some distressed bourgeoise's layette, and were now palmed off by the auctioneer to enhance their price as having been worn by the Prince at whose birth, seventeen years ago, official France went into the most excessive demonstration of delight that ever hailed the advent of a Royal child on our planet.

The Pall Mall Gazette offers the following remarks with reference to the sale: If these articles are being disposed of for the benefit of the poor lady, all that can be said is that her friends are not doing a good work in the pleasantest way. But if the Empress' clothing is being disposed of for the advantage of the French nation, the transaction seems rather mean. The French people can hardly have quarreled with their once admired Empress so violently as to sanction the confiscation of her pocket handkerchiefs. Even irascible Britons when they quarrel with a servant do not make such a raid upon her property. Surely the Empress should have been allowed to "send for her trunks!"

Fallen from Its High Degree.

There was a time when to be an officer in the army of the United States was evidence of ability and a passport to the most refined and intellectual society. A graduate of West Point was a gentleman and a scholar. The society of the officers of the army was sought for as a thing desirable. A retired engineer or surgeon at once found, in civil life, prompt employment. To have been in the army and to have resigned therefrom was the highest evidence of capacity, and was the stepping-stone to the highest civil honors. Graduates of West Point were gentlemen of education and refinement. Then came the war. The value of the West Point institution was illustrated in the success of its graduates and the almost universal failure of those officers who came into the army from civil life. The army was increased from the volunteer force through the influence of politicians, a gang of uneducated trifling boys came in as lieutenants and captains and commissaries, till now the whole morale of the army is changed—changed in every respect. Shape and talent have given way to an awkward and ignorant squad of boorish, ill-dressed clowns. The prestige of the whole thing is gone. Our suggestion is now that there be a radical change. In time of peace there is no necessity for an army. All the country needs is a police force. Let a law be introduced disbanding the army altogether, and in its place establish a national police. Change the names and titles of officers. Let General Sherman be styled "Chief of the National Police." Let Sheridan be "First Assistant." Let the crop of Major and Brigadier Generals be styled "Detectives." As for the Captains and Lieutenants, let them be simply ministered. Let their duties be defined. They may, as now, be stationed on the frontiers to catch runaway horse thieves, and to arrest drunken Indians. Arm them with clubs and whistles. Take off the epaulets and bullion braid, and cover them with water-proof capes. Instead of giving appointments to the poor relations of politicians, let a standard of height and physical qualification be established: good, tall, broad-shouldered, resolute men, instead of short, spindleg-legged, cock-eyed youngsters. This would save our pretty young girls from being dazzled by bright buttons to marry, and thus hundreds of young women would be saved from baby-bearing in out-of-the-way barracks and military posts. All the First and Second Lieutenants of a regiment would not boil down and concentrate into one first-class officer. A reform is needed. We go for a National Police; Lieutenants to be numbered and wear a star.

— The following striking illustrations of Professor Fowler's skill as a phrenologist were unintentionally overlooked by the Alta, or they would have been published along with the others: (1.) In 1847 Mr. Fowler received a call from a lady, who requested him to examine the head of her infant and tell her for what pursuit in life he was best fitted. The Professor carefully felt the innocent's headpiece, and gave the opinion following: "Madam, I find the organ of benevolence enormously developed. It is as prominent as a pigeon's egg. Train up the child to give alms to the poor. He will some day be President of the Society for the Prevention of Indigence to the Starving. Madam, my fee is ten dollars." The woman paid the fee, first learning the exact location of the organ of benevolence. Returning home, she took the head of the child between her hands, applied both thumbs to the conspicuous organ and squeezed it in until the depression would have held a walnut. That child is now grown to man's estate, and for twelve years has supported his parents by stealing. (2.) In Cincinnati the Professor was asked to examine the heads of some bank employes, and describe the character of each. He did so. All were unimpeachable but one. Of him he said: "This is a dangerous person. His organ of acquisitiveness is so inordinately large that he would get up of a cold winter night to steal money from his own pantaloons. I advise his immediate discharge." "Sir," said the smiling Cashier, "that is the President of this institution." "I can't help it," returned the implacable phrenologist, "the man's a born thief." It is painful to proceed: three minutes afterward the corresponding organ upon the Professor's own head was so fearfully swollen that he attempted to thieve a neighboring church by tugging at the water-spout.

Love's Expositors.

How is it that in all the earth
 All that is beautiful in birth
 Or being, seems a part of her?
 The waters seem to hsp her name,
 Winds whisper it, and all things claim
 To be my love's interpreter.

The birds all sing of it. The flowers
 Must know these secret thoughts of ours,
 The very air seems laden so
 With music of unburdened speech,
 That lies forever out of reach,
 Yet follows me where'er I go.

Singing, she passed me in the wood
 But yesterday; unseen I stood.
 And all things stood to see her pass.
 The wild flowers laughed beneath her
 I thought the very earth was glad [bread.
 To have her shadow on the grass.

Birds followed her, and all things bent
 The way her blessed footsteps went,
 And watched her to the very last.
 The winds sank down and only sighed,
 And eager daisies, open-eyed,
 Stared after her until she passed.

Irrigation.

The last message of Governor Low, sent to the Assembly in 1866, was accompanied by a report from the then Surveyor-General upon a projected canal for the irrigation of lands lying along the west bank of the Sacramento River, which attracted but little attention at the time, but which is now well worth recurring to, in view of the great interest which is attaching to the subject generally throughout the State at present. We have not the report before us, but our recollection of some of the leading facts presented is sufficiently accurate to enable us to base a few remarks upon them in connection with similar works now being undertaken. The proposition had been mooted to take out the waters of the Sacramento River somewhere in the vicinity of Stony Creek, or near Red Bluffs, and carry them in a canal adapted equally for irrigation and navigation along the base of the Coast Range, debouching finally into Suisun Bay. It was to convey the requisite information as to the utility and practicability of such a scheme, that the Legislature directed the Surveyor-General to examine and report upon the project, and the result of his examination was embodied in the report in question. A computation of the rainfall for the ten preceding years throughout the district in question yielded the following remarkable results: Throughout the Sacramento Valley and the district through which it was proposed to convey the waters by canalization, the average rainfall was six inches, whereas at the point where it was proposed to take out the water the average was ninety-six inches per annum! Thus ninety inches of water, or three times the amount required to constitute a first-class rainy season in the valley, were absolutely lost and wasted, flowing off to the ocean through the bed of the Sacramento, and benefiting nobody. We have no doubt that were the statistics at hand a similar state of affairs would be found to exist in the San Joaquin Valley—only, perhaps, more plainly marked, as the mountains at the head of that stream and of its great tributaries are more rugged and higher than those of any other part of the Sierra Nevada. The report in question attracted at the time no particular attention, for the seasons subsequent to its publication were propitious and men thought very little of irrigation. The experience of the last two or three years, however, has forced the subject upon us, and the man who does not to-day realize the fact that the salvation of the State lies in a proper system of distribution of our surplus waters has not properly considered the great question which is pressing upon us. We need great irrigating works throughout the entire State, and we never can properly reap the advantages of our geographical position, our soil and our climate, until we have them. This position we consider impregnable. We do not propose to argue it. We know it is true, and we speak to those who with us recognize its truth. The question follows, how are they to be constructed? A few enterprising men, who, holding a large proportion of the realized capital of the State in their hands, are naturally most interested in the welfare of the country at large, have taken steps towards constructing irrigation works in the San Joaquin Valley; and without having said much about it, are pushing a great canal along the west bank of the river from the Tulare Lakes towards Antioch. This scheme is a noble one, and will be productive of immense good, but it after all must be limited in its scope, and unworthy of the great future that lies before us. Large as is the aggregated capital of such a company (and when we say it is headed by such men as Friedlander, Bensley, Ralston, Luning and such, its resources will be recognized as certainly highly respectable), it is small compared with what is actually required. The State should take hold of it and assist the work, and we hope most sincerely that the new Legislature will take prompt steps to lend it its aid. We want a complete system of irrigating and navigation canals for our two great valleys, and the public money or the public credit could be in no way so well employed as in being lent to the construction thereof. We cannot get or grant lands—which is the favorite, though wasteful and clumsy method of late adopted for the aid of public works; but our State credit stands high abroad, and this can be lent, and judiciously lent, will multiply the resources of the country and thereby fortify itself a thousand times. Let these gentlemen by all means be backed by the State and encouraged to develop what is now a limited scheme into a great system of water distribution, and take the word of the News Letter for it, a greater result will be achieved thereby for California than has been or can be worked out by all the railroads (valuable adjuncts of civilization as they are,) that have ever been projected or constructed since Whitney first broached his plan of an overland road, now some quarter of a century ago.

Our Swamp Lands and Future Gardens.

Tide lands can be thoroughly reclaimed for less than the cost of fencing ordinary uplands.

They can be irrigated at every high tide, if necessary, without any other labor than leaving the flood gates open to allow the water to flow in from the river.

Low tide falls from four to six feet below the surface of the land, thus giving a height which is more than ample for drainage.

The tide water in the river is perfectly fresh.

This facility of irrigation enables the farmers to raise several crops yearly, in some instances as many as four. We saw the third crop of Alfalfa hay that had been cut on the same land this year, the average yield being over two tons per acre for each cutting or crop, or over six tons in all. In other places we saw heavy crops of volunteer hay growing since the grain was cut. In other places we saw fine fields of potatoes that had been planted after the grain was harvested. We heard of two heavy crops of hay and one of grain that had been produced the same season on the same land.

The soil is very light and ashy, and does not bake when irrigated; this character enables it to be plowed and worked without injury when very wet.

The climate is cool and healthy, with a strong daily breeze. We neither saw nor heard of a case of sickness. We saw families who, residing in the midst of the tules for many years, looked the very picture of health. This exemption from sickness is undoubtedly owing to the strong breezes that blow on Suisun Bay and up the San Joaquin River.

This land is very accessible to the San Francisco market; steamers pass along the different rivers every night, arriving in San Francisco before daylight the following morning, thus delivering the produce fresh every day without any land carriage—a very important item in the articles milk, butter, fruit, vegetables, etc., etc. Heavy freight can be sent by sailing vessels for 50 cents to $1 per ton, delivered alongside of the vessels in San Francisco.

This saving in freight is a very important item, as it enables the farmer to send his most bulky produce to market—such as hay, straw, etc., etc.—which he could not do if he was subject to a high freight tariff. The majority of farmers in the Upper San Joaquin and Sacramento River valleys, and in the northern and southern counties of this State, have to pay over five dollars per ton freight on their produce to San Francisco, or four dollars more per ton than the rate from these tide lands. Say that the yield of each is thirty-one bushels of wheat to the acre; this is about equal to one ton, on which four dollars at least can be saved in freight, which is ten per cent. on forty dollars. This represents the difference in value of the above lands in the item of freight alone; but if the yield of the tide lands should be estimated at sixty-two bushels per acre, which is still under the average, then they are worth eighty dollars per acre more than the others.

The yield of these lands seems incredible. All kinds of fruits, vegetables, grain, grasses, etc., etc., in fact everything grows in the greatest profusion. Twitchell Island, which two years ago was a swamp as bad as any on the river, yielded this year eighty bushels of wheat and one hundred bushels of barley to the acre, besides a heavy crop of volunteer hay on that portion irrigated after the grain was harvested. A party who had been farming in San Joaquin County became convinced last May that his crops there would be a failure, came down and leased a part of the Webb tract, in order to prevent his stock from starving. In August he prepared and sowed a tract in oats, which yielded over three tons of hay, and left a net profit of over fifty dollars per acre.

If the work that is now being done on these lands for their reclamation had been done in 1852, they would have been overflowed only twice since then, i. e., for eight weeks in 1861-62, and for four weeks in 1867-68—in both cases the water subsided in time to have allowed crops to have been planted in April and May. This land would not have lost a single crop in nineteen years from flood, much less from drought. Owing to the great width of the lower San Joaquin River, which is from one to two miles wide, there is scarcely any current—even in great freshets except the ebb and flow of the tide. The high water is caused by the back-water from the Sacramento River, and there being so little current, the levees or improvements cannot be injured by it, nor the soil by a deposit of sand, which can only be kept in suspension by a strong current, and is all deposited in the upper San Joaquin and Sacramento. A large part of these lands are already connected with the main land, and any of the islands can also be connected for less than one thousand dollars, by means of floating bridges, which will give an opportunity for driving the stock off, in case of an anticipated flood, of which, by the means of the telegraph, there will be a week's notice, at least.

This land is practically inexhaustible; it is like farming a manure deposit twenty feet in depth—if the top should ever become exhausted, all that will be necessary will be to plow a little deeper and turn up a fresh portion of manure.

The question is frequently asked, what would be the effect of a flood on these lands? As before stated, the actual injury would be very little; but for the sake of argument, we will take Twitchell Island and suppose that the future will be like the past in respect to floods—in the past nineteen years we have had two floods that would have risen over the top of the present levees; we will also suppose that these two floods will destroy all the levees, improvements, etc., on the island, all of which could now be built for five dollars per acre. As previously stated these floods subside in February, the levee could be rebuilt during March and April, and the crops could be sown in May and June—as all the land under cultivation on this island this year averaged $36 per acre net profit, it is absurd to suppose that any damage caused by a flood would not be repaired immediately, when the cost of doing so is so little in proportion to the profit.

The remark is frequently made that this being a dry year is a favorable one for these lands; this is partially a mistake, as the only advantage a dry over a wet year, is that the produce sells for more—the yield being the same every year.

In conclusion, these lands have a rich, inexhaustible, and most productive soil, which will never suffer from drought, as they can be irrigated at pleasure; a pleasant and healthful climate, and the cheapest freight from any farming lands to San Francisco. These qualities and advantages will in a short time make them the most valuable farming lands on this coast.

— Mr. Alexander H. Stephens edits an Atlanta, Georgia, newspaper, and is stricken with a mighty vexation because his contemporaries of the press do not give his wisdom the benefit of their circulation. If Mr. Stephens will kindly forward us his paper, we shall be most happy to reproduce his pungent four-column paragraphs, with extended and appreciative comments upon the writer's anatomical defects and facial deformities. We shall be pleased, also, if he will furnish the data, to make public the peccadilloes of his dead grandfather and lovingly embalm in congenial gall the memory of his unwholesome sister-in-law. His club-footed uncle shall receive his just measure of attention, and the peculiar squint of his sainted mother shall not be coldly overlooked. If Mr. Stephens is athirst for notoriety, we will prepare a sponge with hyssop and vinegar, and exalt it upon the point of our pen unto his parched lips, that he may drink thereof and hold his peace in sixteen closely-printed columns per day.

— The President of the United States has issued the usual proclamation designating a day of National Thanksgiving. We do not recollect at this moment what day was selected; the turkeys are somewhat more deeply interested than we. The President is of the opinion that we ought not only to be grateful for "our careful exemption" from the evils which have afflicted our less deserving fellow mortals, but ought to invoke God's protection and kindness for those "whom in His wisdom He has deemed it best to chastise." It is our own opinion that if God deems it best to chastise anybody, the chances are that the punishment is richly deserved, and any protest upon our part would be resented as a piece of impertinence. When there is any chastisement going on, it is the prudent thing for parties not immediately interested to preserve an outward appearance of respectful acquiescence, or they may chance to feel the lash themselves.

— The woman who knows her wrongs, and knowing dares redress, is entitled to our respectful admiration. Such a woman is Mrs. James Sullivan, of Contra Costa County—a dame of whom it may never be said that she tamely submitted to the outrage of a brother-in-law's presence at the family table. That interesting relative now sleeps in the valley, with only the ragged stump of a neck to show what he died of. Married men who have brothers liable to dine at the house would economize in funeral expenses by hanging the shot gun out of reach. It is unwise to expose a wife to the temptation of shooting a brother-in-law, unless it is desired that she should do it.

— Some brilliant pharmacist has gone into the business of manufacturing butter from cod-liver oil. The offensive taste is so thoroughly disguised that those who eat of it will never afterward touch any other kind. In fact they won't eat much of anything afterward. Babies cry for it, and adults weep because of it. If ever we shall see the announcement of the inventor's death, we shall drop a note to our responsible editor, Mr. Satan, begging him to stew the ingenious youth in his own gravy. If it is not done we shall have to seek retribution by blackening the wretch's memory with an obituary notice, and slandering his bereaved widow.

— We note the formation of a Loan Society to relieve the suffering farmers of the San Joaquin Valley. The society is to loan them what money they require, and be reimbursed when the farmers harvest their next crop. The interest, we suppose, will be about two and one half per cent. per month, or some such benevolent rate. We have made a free gift of nearly two hundred thousand dollars to the people of Chicago and other places. To the handful of equally needy persons in our midst we loan such small sums as we have no better investment for. ### Special Brevities.

— An important step toward railroad consolidation was accomplished recently in London by the union "for working purposes" of the London and Northwestern and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railroads. The combined length of these two roads is about 2,000 miles, and their aggregate capital is over $400,000,000. As they transact about a fifth part of the entire railway business of the United Kingdom, it will be the biggest undertaking of the kind in the world; and the London Spectator holds that "it is a great step towards a single center of management for the English railway system—the greatest reform of that nature that could well be conceived."

— Thomas Pilgrim, engineer, aged seventy-one years, died on October 6th, at Plumstead, Kent, England. For the last thirty-five years he was intimately associated with Mr. Francis Pettit Smith, and the introduction of the screw propeller. It may be remembered by some that Mr. Pilgrim acted as chief engineer of the Archimedes, celebrated in the history of steam navigation as the first ship ever sent to sea propelled by the screw.

— Not a quarter of a century since the Scotch metropolis was a veritable capital. She had her distinguished circles of society, and she numbered among her inhabitants men whose names were known through Europe. But the glory has departed from her. The giant limbs of London have been extending themselves in every direction with their strange and resistless attraction. London, in truth, has socially absorbed Edinburgh.

— There is no habit which is so disposed to grow upon a person as that of drinking. Even water-drinking, apparently so harmless, becomes, with some people, a pernicious habit; they cannot exert themselves in any way without drinking water; they drink many glasses of water daily between meals. This habit is an injurious one; it weakens the digestive power, hastens waste, and probably tends to produce corpulency.

— From the Australian Israelite we learn the interesting fact that, after erecting almshouses, the Jewish Philanthropic Society can find no one poor enough to go into them. The most suitable applicant is a man with an income of $94 a week, and a sum of a hundred pounds safely lodged in one of the banks. If this be the poorest of the tribe, it is difficult to gauge the wealth of the richest. —Auckland (N. Z.) Weekly News.

Seven hundred and fifty thousand calves are raised and branded every year. All are raised on the great plains of Texas, which cover an area of one hundred and fifty-two million acres.

— A few days ago a young lady residing near Portree, while dressing on the beach after bathing, observed a large fish swimming near the shore. In she plunged, half-dressed as she was, and after several efforts managed to grasp and land the fish, which weighed no less than thirty-five pounds, and proved to be a small specimen of the sun-fish.

Concerning Petitions.

There is no easier way to get rid of an undeserving beggar than to give him alms. There is a better way, but most people prefer the more expeditious method, if they happen to have more money than leisure. This is a weakness of which beggars are not slow to reap the advantage. The most exasperating mendicant is the one who solicits, not your purse, but your signature to a petition. He commonly gets it, and you consider his taking himself off an equivalent. Usually it is not; for he will send a friend to vex you with another petition. There are men in this city who seem to make petitioning a business. They are always wanting somebody appointed in the Mint, Customs, or other public institution, and the cheek of them is somewhat astonishing. The least impudent of their feats would put the devil to the blush. It is becoming dangerous to drive along the street, lest some petition-monger should lay hold upon your horses' heads and demand your signature to a document asking an appointment for some entire stranger, whom you never saw, never will see, and don't wish to see. The chances are about even that you will get out of your buggy, go into the nearest saloon, and append your name with lamb-like docility. These only moderately profound reflections have been suggested by seeing a paper, about a cloth-yard in length, filled with the names of some of our first business men, who pray for the appointment of one Gannon as Commissary of the State Prison at San Quentin. Now, we have never been blessed with a sight of this worthy party, and, in our belief, a majority of these good-natured petitioners know as little of him as we. In fact, they know less, if they are honest, for we know the gentleman was President of a faro bank last winter at San Rafael, to the great scandal of a very decent community. What his present profession may be we have not inquired. Possibly, Mr. Gannon is a respectable person; but, if so, Webster's Dictionary is absurdly erroneous in its definition of respectability. However, we care nothing for him; the object of this article is to protest against the lavish prodigality of our business men in the matter of giving their influence. One's name should be considered as nearly sacred as one's commercial integrity, which it so frequently represents. It is very closely allied to one's personal honor, and a man ought to be as careful in lending the one as in guarding the other. There is a species of dishonesty in indorsing a man whom you do not clearly know to be, in every respect, capable and worthy. There are comparatively few men of whom you do know this, and, as a rule, they do not require your indorsement, nor anybody's.

Very Like a Whale.

Persons who have been accustomed to oil themselves all over every morning with whale oil (we do not know that there are any such persons) will find their expenses materially increased during the next year or two. The loss of nearly our entire whaling fleet, and the return empty-handed of the remainder, is a disaster of considerable magnitude—except to those with large stocks of oil and bone on hand. These will probably manage to worry along in some way. Such a calamity occurring before the niggardly earth had been taught to yield up her hoarded store of petroleum, would have stopped a multitude of busy wheels the world over, and would have been keenly felt in scores of industries which will not now be seriously affected. The wound is not "as wide as a church door, nor deep as a draw well, but it is enough;" it will make somebody bleed. It is an ill wind, etc., but in this case the advantage can hardly be considered a compensating one, inasmuch as it accrues mainly to our natural enemies, the whales, who may hereafter flirt their flukes and snort sea-water with comparative impunity. The business of fishing (a whale is not a fish; we will say mammalini) for whales is practically dead, and New Bedford and Nantucket will wear the usual badge of mourning for something more than thirty days, unless sooner consoled. Before another fleet of forty vessels shall be sent into the Arctic Sea, Leviathan will have so increased and multiplied that one may find very good whaling lower down. It is not that the loss is in any sense irreparable, but whaling was upon its last legs before it occurred, and it will not pay to revive the business upon so large a scale. New Bedford will find it to her advantage to beat her greasy harpoon into a plow-share and go to cultivating potatoes.

— The U. A. O. D. have elected the following officers for the ensuing term: Samuel Patch, 'Normous Ass'; Thomas Bryan, Violent Ape; H. Bernstein, Imbecile Grandmother; Charles Grasslicht, Tinker; N. Levy, Stinker. If we have misstated the titles of these gentlemen they will probably see the advisability of hereafter printing them in full, instead of giving only the initial letter of each. The Uncommonly Asinine Order of Dunces are respectfully requested to hold another election and publish the result in the newspapers.

— People who admire the Paris letters of the Call's correspondent, "Flaneur," will be glad to learn that they can obtain them fresh in the Boston Post. They also appear in a New York paper, the name of which we do not at this moment remember, and, we suppose, in a Philadelphia paper, a Baltimore paper, a Chicago paper, and the Lord knows how many others. It may be urged that this is none of our business. We have never claimed that it was.

Private Enterprise and Public Benefit.

But few persons realize the great benefit that will result to San Francisco from the reclamation of the swamp lands in different parts of the State. For example, let us take a small portion of these lands contiguous to the San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers, below Stockton and Sacramento, and above salt water in Suisun Bay. This embraces an area of over 300,000 acres of what will be the best land in the State. A large part of this is being reclaimed now, and reclamation will be finished on all within three years. Suppose that this work had been commenced five years ago, so that all the land could have been under cultivation this year of drought; this land will average over sixty bushels or two tons of wheat to the acre, and would have given a total of 600,000 tons more for shipment than we have, or WE COULD HAVE FURNISHED FREIGHT FOR SIX HUNDRED SHIPS OF ONE THOUSAND TONS EACH IN ADDITION TO THOSE THAT HAVE BEEN OR WILL BE LOADED THIS YEAR, and this can be done ANY YEAR WITHOUT REGARD TO WET OR DRY SEASON, and all this without diminishing any other products, for the land has been heretofore entirely useless and unproductive. The merchant, banker, shipper, real estate owner, etc., etc., in fact everybody in San Francisco and its neighborhood, is deeply interested in this enterprise, and hereafter, when reaping benefits from it, should not forget Geo. D. Roberts, A. G. Kimball, and Edward B. Dorsey, the projectors and promoters of this great enterprise, who by their indomitable energy and perseverance, without State or national aid, converted a dreary, useless swamp into the most valuable and productive lands on this coast, for which they should be considered public benefactors, as they will have created from a waste a great public prosperity. But few men have done as much to promote the solid prosperity of this coast, and for which they are deserving of our heartiest thanks as well as our best wishes for their individual prosperity. The following is an extract from a description of the tule lands, by Judge J. W. Dwinelle, as published in the Oakland Daily News of October 23d:—

MODE OF TREATING TULE SOIL.—The upper tule lands upon the Sacramento and its sloughs are brought under cultivation with more difficulty than those upon the San Joaquin. The former do not burn so deeply, and it is thought that they must first be run over with a tule cutter, which divides the surface into narrow strips, which are then turned over with the plow. But the tules on the San Joaquin are reclaimed by fire. When sufficiently dry they are set on fire; the fire penetrates under the surface turf and works along under it, burning to the depth of eighteen inches. When it has burnt out and the ashes are cold, wheat is sown broadcast, sheep are turned in and driven over it to trample the wheat in; the water is let on and then drawn off; and then comes the harvest. These tule planters are a curious set. Instead of blessing the land, they "dam it"; they irrigate it by dykeing out the water; and they prepare it for sowing by burning it up.

VALUE OF THE RECLAIMED LANDS.—These lands, when once reclaimed, present three estimable qualities: First. They are rich, almost beyond the possibility of exhaustion. Secondly. They can be enriched every year by letting in the waters of the river, and letting them deposit their silt—the soil which they hold in suspension. Thirdly. They can be irrigated, most of them, every day, and all of them once a month, at spring tide. They have all the advantages of the Nile-irrigated valley of Egypt, and even more; for in Egypt the husbandman must wait two months for the water to subside, and the two months thus saved in California represent a crop of some kind. It may be that once in ten or twelve years all these lands, together with their dykes, may be overflowed by unusual freshets; but even then a crop of wheat could be sown and harvested after the waters had subsided. These qualities will surely make these lands the most productive and the most reliable, and therefore the most valuable of any in California. And this region, when once reclaimed, with its mild climate and gentle winds, must become a place of great resort and residence. The San Joaquin, in this region, is not a river, but a great lake, and must hereafter be the scene of regattas and yachting, in the midst of the garden of California.

— In accounting for cannibalism the learned Dr. Schaafhausen says the unpleasant practice is partly owing to the appetizing excellence of human flesh. We shall believe this when it is proven that men eat carrion crow because they like it, that bull beef is of delicate flavor, and that mousy pork is preferable to pate de fete grise. Our own impression is that man-meat is stringy, rancid and unwholesome. As to woman-meat—well we like that ourselves.

— The fire-fiend has descended to petty details. After consuming some scores of populous cities, and several thousand square miles of woodland, he started in on little Hannah Gray, of Tehama, and disposed of her skin with neat alacrity. The Besom of Destruction, beloved of newspaper reporters, might find a more dignified employment than sweeping up these trifling atoms of living dirt—these small fly-specks of humanity.

— A city paper tells of a man who "died unexpectedly." Life is full of these easant surprises.

The Ivied Cottage.

She dwells in an ivied cottage,
Half hidden by chestnut trees,
Whose leaves betimes when they waver,
Have a sound like moaning seas.
And oft in the quiet evening
I've walked by that cottage door;
And seen, through the open window,
The sunshine picture the floor.

And there, in that lonely cottage,
Lives a maiden with blue eyes,
That seem to her artless beauty
What stars are unto the skies.
She walks with a grace that's nameless,
And ne'er a moment seems lone;
The chastened charm in her features
Pure as a lily half-blown!

She sits by the open window,
And plies her needle and thread;
When winds are swinging the roses,
And the sun is setting red.
When the winds have swung the roses
They ripple her dainty curls,
That fall in a glossy cluster
On shoulders whiter than pearls.

Near to that cottage I've lingered,
In the long, long summer eves;
And sighed to talk to the maiden,
As low as the fluttering leaves—
To tell her I love her beauty;
But all my wishes are vain;
My heart, my heart is the maiden's,
Yet hers I never may gain.

Our Bankers Abroad.

Late files from European papers comment favorably on the appointment of the London firm of Henry Clews & Co., as bankers abroad for all foreign countries of the U. S. Government and the Treasury Department, in place of Baring Bros. It is true that no feeling but the utmost cordiality of spirit exists between these two representative banking houses. It is not true that Baring Bros. have transacted their business with the Government in an unsatisfactory manner. On the contrary, the utmost good feeling has existed from the beginning of the trust up to the present time. It is true that the Government has confidence in the house of Henry Clews & Co., and it is rather a testimonial of confidence in their manner of doing business than a reward for services rendered to the Government by Mr. Clews, that has secured the appointment of Henry Clews & Co. as our bankers abroad. This house has risen rapidly in public confidence until it has reached the Government, which nationalizes its popularity by conferring the present appointment of fiscal agents. Probity, tact, patriotism and financial power thus get a compliment. The duties of their position are such that it cannot but tend to give general confidence throughout this country and in Europe to the name and credit of this leading banking house.

The State Investment Insurance Company.

The result of the Chicago fire is to revolutionize the whole business of insurance. Weak and illegitimate companies will be driven out of the field, rates will be increased, more property will be insured, greater precautions will be taken against fires, cities and towns will increase and improve their fire engines and their facilities for extinguishing conflagrations, buildings will be constructed of better material and water supplies multiplied. For San Francisco we suggest two great reservoirs on our highest hills, to be filled with salt water to be used for flushing sewers, sprinkling streets, and for fire purposes. We are glad to notice the formation in San Francisco of a new Company, "The State Investment Insurance Company," composed of our best and most wealthy people. It is started at a good time, under favorable auspices, and will undoubtedly prove a success. Capital, $500,000 gold. Tyler Curtis is President, Peter Donahue to manage its finances, General Cazneau to control its marine department. A noticeable feature of the new organization is to have a Board of Directors in each county, and the funds subscribed in the counties and the premiums taken to be invested in their own locality.

— The Young Men's Christian Association are now conducting the fourth season of their free singing school. Persons desiring to hear the meek and pious Mr. Gashwiler hymning praises to the Most High in nasal notes a trifle higher, should visit the temple on Sutter street after the adjournment of the Board of Brokers.

— Whoever says that Republics are ungrateful is guilty of imaginative mendacity. In St. Louis is a man who had both legs shot away at the battle of Corinth, and he is permitted to sleep every night in an abandoned dog-house, the owner declining to tear it down until the hero shall be provided for at the Alms House.

— There is a question as to whether Kershaw's Island is an island. If it is, it belongs to the Government; if not, not. The Sancelito Herald says it has been occupied by a guard of United States troops. It is, therefore, an island. This may be called Government logic.

Court Chat.

— Our American cousins, who are always seeking to make use of the privilege assigned to that peculiar tie of relationship to annoy and distress us, have just discovered that in default of heirs to the British throne the crown would revert by right to Kaiser William! The title of the present Royal Family dates from the Act of Settlement by which the crown of Great Britain was secured to the descendants of Sophia, Electress of Hanover, the youngest daughter of James I. The grandson of that prince, James II., was driven from the throne, or rather abdicated. Therefore he became not only excluded from power himself, but the exclusion fell also upon his younger born children. Then came William of Orange and his wife, eldest daughter of the dethroned king. Failing issue of that marriage, the Princess Anne, consort of Prince George of Denmark, succeeded; and failing her issue, the descendants of the Electress Sophia of Hanover came to the throne. It was a belief of George IV. that he could not in conscience, however secure in law, have become truly King of England until the line of the Stuarts was extinct in the person of Cardinal York. This was a gross mistake. The title of the present family to the crown rests upon the Act of Settlement—the compact entered into with the nation. There is, fortunately, but little prospect that the present race should become extinct, but if ever this should be the case, then, according to the Act of Settlement, the King of Prussia, Emperor of Germany, will be clearly entitled to succeed to the throne, as he is the only representative of the Electress Sophia of Hanover. Now this is the unkindest cut of all, and will be quite sufficient argument in favor of dotation of the Royal Princes on their marriage when next the subject comes to be discussed in Parliament. Can imagination picture the landing of Kaiser William on the shores of Great Britain, not as invader, but as sovereign? Can we fancy his reception with banners flying, bells pealing, and shouts of welcome, instead of with the thunders of the British cannon? No, we cannot fancy it; and yet it is all fancy, good Jonathan, rest assured of that. We have an old song about Britons being free, and we could not sing it with such a Kaiser!—Court Journal.

— The following letter from Napoleon III. to Sir John Burgoyne has been published: "Wilhelmshöhe, Oct. 29, 1870. My dear Sir John: I have received your letter, which has given me great pleasure—first, that is a touching proof of your sympathy for me, and also because your name recalls the happy and glorious time when our armies fought together for the same cause. You, who are the Moltke of England, will have understood that our misfortunes arose from the fact that the Prussians were ready sooner than we, and that, so to speak, they surprised us in a shameful state of disorganization. The offensive having become impossible, I resolved to put myself on the defensive, but, hindered by political considerations, a retreat was retarded and soon became impossible. Returning to Chalons, I had wished to lead the last army that remained to us to Paris, but again political considerations forced us to make that most imprudent and little strategical march which ended by the disaster of Sedan. See in few words the unhappy campaign of 1870. I think it right to offer you these explanations, because I wish to retain your esteem. In thanking you for your kind remembrance, I renew to you the assurance of my warmest regards.

NAPOLEON.

Sir John Burgoyne, Field Marshal."

— The story of the Countess Benedetti, wife of the French Minister to Prussia, is worth recording. She was once a Greek slave, landed at Alexandria by Jocoel, the celebrated merchant of Constantinople. She had been educated for sale, and was consequently full of accomplishments. One of the wealthiest of the Arab bankers in Alexandria purchased the girl to wait upon his wife, to whom he was much attached. The Greek girl, lively and amusing, diverted the canon of the harem, and soon became the ruling spirit there. In course of time the wife died, and the aged husband, regretting that he could not marry her, adopted her as his child and the heir to his enormous fortune. At his death the former slave inherited his wealth, and as Benedetti, at that time a young attaché belonging to the French Consulate at Alexandria, happened to present himself to the heiress, won her affections, and they were married. The old merchant's money enabled Benedetti to cut his way to a conspicuous position in diplomacy, and his wife, lovely and accomplished, reigned for a long time over the world of fashion in Paris.

— A genuine Hibernian, of somewhat colorless politics, was returned by an obscure Irish constituency, and on his arrival at St. Stephen's the whips of both parties were anxious to secure him as a supporter. Towards this end Viscountess Beaconsfield (then Mrs. Disraeli) sent him an invitation card. During the evening the company got dispersed into groups, in one of which were Disraeli and the new member, who had been thoroughly overpowered by the brilliant conversation and elegant condescension of his host, to whom, by way of compliment, he said, in the purest brogue—"I have never read your novels myself, but my daughters have, and beaded they say they're mighty clever!" "Sir," said Disraeli, drawing himself up, and looking his admirer full in the face, "that is fame."

— Herr Schulze, who represent different physiognomies by his remarkable powers of mobility of the face, writes that whereas not long ago he used to create a storm of applause by his imitation of Mr. Gladstone, while, on the other hand, Mr. Disraeli "was received very lukewarm," now the positions are reversed, and Mr. Disraeli "receives cheers and applause" in the "best society (see programme) as well as at the music halls," while Mr. Gladstone "scarcely gets a hand, not even so much as Bismarck."

— Verdi has just arrived at Milan, where he was summoned by the impresario of the Khedive's theater at Cairo, to receive into his hands the sum of 100,000 francs in gold pieces, as the price of his new opera to be brought out at Cairo, the subject of which is Arab, and the title Aïdê. They say that the plot was furnished by the Khedive himself, and inspired by an adventure which occurred in his own family. The generous payment of the opera is, therefore, ascribed as much to that amour propre d'auteur which doth make dupes and cowards of all men as to real admiration of the composer's music. Ismail Pasha can afford to be generous; his fortune is estimated at fifteen hundred millions of francs. He entertained at his own expense all the foreigners present at the Suez Canal celebration, the expense being more than fifty millions of francs. The backs of seven millions of poor, starving, ignorant fellahs were made to smart sorely in the cotton plantations for some time after. But what of that? The foreigners went away highly delighted with the Khedive, and that was the aim to be attained with them, and no other.

— At Tarragona, when out in the bay in a fainah, after visiting the man-of-war, the King of Spain requested to be rowed out further to sea, and when at a considerable distance from land, he rose and proceeded to divest himself of his outer clothing. General Balaguer, who was with him, much troubled, ventured to ask what his Majesty proposed doing. "I am going to have a swim," was the laughing reply of the young gentleman at seeing the consternation depicted on the countenances around. "But for Heaven's sake!" remonstrated the general, "consider the immense responsibility devolving upon me if anything should happen to your Majesty." "You may take every precaution you think proper," was the reply, as Royalty plunged into the blue waves of the Mediterranean. There was no help for it but to hurriedly order two stout oarsmen, notable swimmers, to dive in the water after the king, who, after disporting himself to his heart's content, scrambled up the side of the boat, shaking off the water like a Newfoundland pup, evidently in high glee at his brief escapade from the cares and joys of monarchy.

— "What are you in reality? By what title are you empowered to act?" exclaimed an enraged diplomatist at Versailles the other day, when Thiers, as usual, refused to answer an important question under pretense of being compelled to consult his Ministry. "Well, some people call me President of the Republic, others Representative of the Nation; but, in sober truth, I feel myself nothing more than the assignee of a national bankruptcy.

— In Baden Baden it is said the Empress intends to abridge her visit to Spain, and to return to England. Report also adds that she is about to sell her Spanish property. Private letters which have been received here from influential and well-informed quarters in France, insist strongly upon the real importance of the Bonapartist reaction—that the return of the Imperial family is but a question of time.

— The Barnacle is very much angered at the Insurance Companies because "the advice of the press has fallen unheeded." We are not aware that the press has a divine mission to advise men with regard to matters that are none of its business. None may gainsay its right to advise whom or what it may choose to advise; but every man has an equal right to accept or reject its counsel, as he may choose. In the majority of instances it will be found best to treat "the advice of the press" with active indifference. There are very few men who do not know more about the business in which they are engaged than the editor of a newspaper does. If they did not, the business interests of our country would be in a suffering condition.

— In attempting to get up to breakfast, the other morning, a man in Petaluma made an interesting discovery: he discovered that one longitudinal half of him could not get up. The gentleman's left side was paralyzed. We know a man similarly afflicted in the right side. As neither of these persons are of any account in their present condition, we have to suggest that they be bisected, and the living halves joined together, so as to make one good man, and then the other sections would make a nice corpse. There are two objections to this plan: the country would lose a vote by it and there would be two sets of people in half mourning at the funeral. These would probably fight.

— A gentleman writing from the lower Gila says that section is "literally alive with Mexican bandits." By "literally" the gentleman, like most of us who use that word, means "figuratively" of course. Even then the expression is a trifle too strong for the unaided imagination, but if one will divest himself of his clothing and sit down upon an ant-hill, he may obtain a tolerably accurate idea of the writer's meaning. The terrible devil-fish is a very correct type of the Greek brig-and; but the Mexican bandit is neatly figured by the pinching ant.

— A newspaper editor, who endeavors to hide his lack of common sense under a cloak of spiritualism, says that when our gross senses are purged by faith we shall see the air peopled with the winged souls of our departed relatives and friends. The prospect is encouraging; we shall have fine shooting in those days.

Blackberries.

The Trees were flushed with red and gold,
 As, in the warm September weather,
 Among the country lanes we strolled,
 And picked the blackberries together.
 Standing among the russet-brown
 And withered leaves that hid the roots,
 I pulled the bramble branches down,
 And watched her pluck and eat the fruits.
 With tender, purple finger-tips,
 That shunned the thorns with dainty skill,
 She put them to her pouted lips,
 And laughed, and looked more pretty still.
 Her ringing tones awoke the air
 To joyful echoes as she passed;
 Each opening prospect seemed more fair,
 Each lane more tempting, than the last.
 And even now, when strolling through
 The by-ways hedged with bush and bramble,
 I pull a blackberry or two
 In memory of that far-off ramble.

— The following is a tolerably accurate report of the conference between the Fire Commissioners and a Committee of the Chamber of Commerce, relative to the efficiency of the fire department: Mr. Rankin, of the Chamber, said: "I don't precisely know why I came here, but my idea is that the fire department is a machine. I think it is not a political machine; at least it would be unwise to say so. I use the word machine in a Pickwickian sense. There is an impression abroad that the department ought to possess greater efficiency. Courtesy compels me to say that I do not think so. The underwriters have no confidence in Mr. Mooney, the Assistant Engineer. It would be unbecoming in me to indorse their view before the gentlemen who retain him in power. I should be pleased, however, to see Mr. Mooney elected to the Legislature, or appointed to a sinecure in the Custom House." Mr. Rosenfeld, of the Commissioners, replied: "It is not easy to get good men without looking for them." Mr. Rankin—"I have heard it said that Mr. Burkes is a good man, but lest my indorsement should be esteemed impertinent I would wish to be understood as repudiating him." Mr. Taylor, of the Chamber—"Mr. Rankin speaks my opinion exactly. I have heard that the Second Assistant Engineer is incompetent, but it would be a reflection upon the Commissioners to express that sentiment here. Not even knowing his name, I am entirely unprejudiced." Mr. Freeman, of the Commissioners—"There is perfect harmony in the Board, and we are all of your opinion with regard to everything. It is probable that the department is not as good as it was when it was better. Our first and highest duty is to be dutiful. We are looking for a better man than Mr. Mooney, and as soon as we shall find him he will be discovered. We shall have an examination made, and if anybody in the department is found incompetent, that person will be regarded as inefficient. If this policy is regarded by the Chamber as satisfactory, we indulge the hope that it will meet with approval." The Committee hastened to assure the Board that no proposition of equal justice could be fairer than that, and the conference was at an end. As the Commissioners and the Committee were passing into the street, arm in arm, the reporter of the Call was discovered taking copious notes upon the sole of his boot with a tarred stick, and was soundly beaten and driven down a steep place into the sea. It will be a brave conflagration that dares assail San Francisco after this.

— The Rev. Mr. Dole—who the devil is he? Why don't we know him? He would a-preaching go to the benighted mariner, and would advertise himself in the Call. Dole—the Rev. Mr. Dole! For eighty years a missionary at the Cannibal Islands. A good record, in faith; but why is he here? Why doth he dote, and why advertise? Dole, indeed! We have a pig and his name is henceforth Dole; a dog, and Dole shall be his designation; Dole shall our cat be termed, and Dole our bullock be.... We learn that the Rev. Mr. Dole is really a very worthy person. It is to be regretted that his name has got into the newspapers.

— It was stated in the Board of Health that the consumptives at the City and County Hospital require ten pints of whisky per day. We hope the amount will not be very largely increased, for if these poor consumptives were to get intoxicated there would be no one to wait upon the patients.

The Arctic Disasters.

The reported heavy losses sustained by the insurance companies in consequence of the disasters to our whaling fleet in the Arctic Ocean have been overestimated. There are good reasons to believe that a number of the vessels abandoned will survive the dangers threatening them. It is not improbable that counter winds may drive the floes and icebergs out to sea, in which event some of the vessels might be found where anchored at the time of abandonment. Their valuable cargoes of whale oil would suffer no loss, for the article would be preserved in a solid frozen mass, and the rigors of even the Arctic climate could not affect the whalebone and ivory on board. In the case of vessels being driven ashore and wrecked, the most valuable portions of their cargo, and particularly the articles last mentioned, would be found strewn along the beach without having sustained serious damage. The vessels crushed between the floes and icebergs, while a total loss, much of their cargoes would be washed ashore like drift-wood, especially the whalebone. The ivory, owing to its weight, would sink, but even much of this could be grappled for and secured. Without doubt a wrecking company will be organized here, or an additional inducement given to our present one to proceed next spring to Icy Bay for the purpose of securing the valuable products, and which will largely indemnify the parties interested. Well-informed whalers take this view of the situation. The statements to the effect that the natives would destroy any of the vessels which successfully braved the perils, have no truth in fact. Some of our contemporaries do not seem to know that Icy Bay, the scene of the disaster, is in Alaska Territory, at one of the most northern points fronting the Arctic Ocean. The native Esquimaux and the Creoles of Russian and Indian blood, who inhabit that portion of the Territory, have been to some extent civilized by the Russian Government, and are anything but rapacious and piratical in their habits.

— Two girls of Maine have committed suicide by leaping into a cataract, locked in one another's arms, leaving their clothes upon a rock. So says the telegraph. Precisely what significance the position of their clothing may possess we are not informed; satisfied with the general result, we do not propose to inquire. And yet one cannot avoid a feeling of regret that these two guileless beings should have perished in such a manner. We are only moderately heroic, but had we been present we should have been tempted, at the last moment, to rescue one of these innocent creatures by taking her place.

— The Hon. Tom Fitch (Brutus, too, was an honorable man) is enacting the rôle of special apologist for the Mormons. The zeal of this gentleman in behalf of the Saints is somewhat remarkable, considering that he has neither sufficient sagacity to understand them, nor a sufficient sense of justice to espouse their cause if he did. We are forced to conclude that the Hon. Tom has blundered into the right from a mistaken notion regarding his personal interests.

— Lawrence Gorman, of this city, has been fined five dollars for assailing the partner of his joys and sorrows. When people become partners in joy and sorrow the implied understanding should be faithfully adhered to. It is evident that when the male partner wallops the female partner he forces upon her a sorrow in which he declines to participate, and grasps a supreme joy from which she is meanly excluded. It is proper that he should forfeit five dollars. In aggravated cases even six would not be too much.

— We observe indications that the roller-skating nonsense is to have another season of popularity. We suppose there is no legal way to suppress it. Legislation against fools would—for a reason we do not care to specify—be declared unconstitutional by every Judge upon the Bench. Personal considerations, it may be added, never influence judicial decisions. It may be urged that that has no obvious connection with roller-skating. We suppose a philosopher may be permitted to digress.

He commenced unburthening his infant soul of that definition as long ago as we began to read the newspapers, and he is at it yet. Had his growth not been stunted and his genius perverted, he might now have been enjoying a lusty manhood in the walls of a penitentiary.]

— In a preceding paragraph we omitted to state that the reason every one reads the advertisements in the Morning Call is this: They are the most interesting matter in the paper.

The Foundation Stone of the New City Hall.

From the earliest ages the laying of the foundation stone of a building has been attended with some ceremony. Indeed the ancients regarded the act with more veneration and religious feeling than we of this more prosaic age experience. We are happy therefore to notice that the Commissioners of the New City Hall are determined to give due weight and solemnity to this, the initiatory step, in that which is destined to be the principal public building in San Francisco—a building which will be a delight to the eye and a memorial of those who superintended its erection. There will in reality be two foundation stones laid, for taking warning by Chicago, the Commissioners have resolved that the Hall of Records shall be a detached building and as fire-proof as engineering skill can make it. The New City Hall will be built to endure; its foundations will be wide, deep and strong; there will be no jobbery, no face work, glozing over cheap contracts, but good, honest, substantial masonry. Our number of the Mail Bag for January will contain a beautiful engraving of the City Hall, with medallion portraits of the three Commissioners and the Architect. The frontispiece of the same number will contain a portrait of Mr. Alvord, the Mayor elect. This, therefore, will be a number especially dedicated to San Francisco, whose best interests the proprietor ever has at heart. We have recently visited the New City Hall Reservation, formerly the Yerba Buena Park, and found that the work of putting in the concrete foundations of the extensive buildings for the New City Hall and Law Courts was being energetically and rapidly proceeded with, and that the stonework of the superstructure will shortly be commenced. With respect to this building we observed the other day a question mooted in the Alta California, by a correspondent writing under the signature of "Safety," which we consider not of very great importance, viz.: whether the building is to be constructed, as far as possible, of fireproof materials. We have seen lately in this city a notable example of the results of the "penny wise and pound foolish" system of building, in the total destruction of the Harparding block, when, if proper precautions had been observed in putting up the buildings, the fire would in all probability have been confined to one store instead of destroying the whole block. We are amongst those who are of opinion that it is high time that a proper Building Act should be passed and put in force in this city, in order to guard as much as possible against the property and lives of citizens being endangered by the ill-judged parsimony and false economy often displayed in building. If such regulations were in force here as are in many other cities, and a safer class of buildings was erected, it would shortly be found that a very great saving would be effected in the matter of insurances, as the rates could then be very materially reduced and still leave a much better and safer business for the offices. But although nothing is done in the way of controlling the construction of private buildings in the city, we should surely see that our public buildings are carried out in a proper and durable manner, and especially in the case of the costly and important structure just commenced; a structure which we are erecting for no temporary purpose, but which ought to be such as to be still an ornament and a credit to San Francisco when the city shall have increased many fold in size and population. Our new Mint is being built fire-proof under the control of the United States Government, and we trust that the city will in this instance follow so good an example. But above all let us have the very best system of fire-proof construction known—not a mere sham, which shall give us a false security, and fail us in our hour of need, as in the case of the Chicago Custom House, where the supposed fire-proof vaults gave way and collapsed before the fiery element, reducing their millions of green-backs to dust, and restoring their gold coin to its original shape of bullion. It is quite possible to construct a building which shall be, practically, incombustible and indestructible by fire. Let, then, the City Hall Commissioners instruct their architect to prepare his designs and estimates accordingly. We know, from the information and particulars we have obtained, that the sum proposed to be expended upon the buildings will not be sufficient to bear the extra cost which will be entailed by fire-proofing the whole structure, but let us know what that extra cost will be; and then we very much mistake the character of the citizens of San Francisco if they do not decide to incur the cost in order to gain the very great and manifest advantage which would thus be purchased.

— Some scoundrels broke into a church in Savannah, Georgia, and stole a Sunday School library. It has since transpired that the ringleader was a youth of sixteen, who had been a regular pupil. He had, on the Sunday previous, taken out the first volume of a moral work, and having devoured its contents in two days, was impatient to learn the final fate of the little boy therein mentioned, who disregarded all the Ten Commandments.

— One day last week a Chinaman employed in a saloon washing dishes dropped dead at his work. The incident is noteworthy from the fact that in gathering this Asian to his fathers God did not make use of the usual Irishman. This simple directness should be encouraged. Nobody objects to the taking off of any number of Chinamen, provided the useful Celt is not withdrawn from any productive industry to assist at it.

— If the blessed Satan ever thoroughly enjoyed himself away from home, it was at "Scudder's Church," last Monday evening, when a shepherd was elected to shear the flock, and be shorn in return. The candidates were the Rev. Mr. Thompson (with a p) and the Rev. Mr. Carpenter. After the meeting was called to a condition that was facetiously termed "order," ten minutes were allowed for electioneering and betting on the result. At this point the agony began. The old rams of the flock reared upon their hind legs and expressed their preferences in guttural staccato; the ewes exalted their shrill voices in tremulous bleatings; even the lambs shook the kinks out of their tails and relieved their anxiety by frisking in meaningless gambols up and down the aisles. You could not have heard the report of a committee of the largest calibre. The clamor and clatter and deafening din beat softly against the secular tympanum like a tempest of cobble-stones upon an iron shutter. The godless infidel fled affrighted from the house of God! The germ of conviction in the scoffer's heart budded into impenitence, and blossomed broadly into open profanity as he got his hat to go! In the dictation of the only sinner who sat it out, "'twas a mule corral talkin' politics out loud!" Knowlton was there, howling for Thompson. Barstow, of the jolly nose, warbled like a brace of fowls for Carpenter. They were appointed tellers to keep them still. At the expiration of the ten minutes, a silence so dense that it might have been molded in the hands like a snow-ball, fell upon the congregation; you could have heard a gum drop. One by one the ballots settled into the greasy hats of Knowlton and of Barstow. The result was soon apparent without counting: Carpenter had it. The Devil, who had all the while been sitting lock-legged upon the bible-cushion, slanted his fine eye downward upon the pastor elect, stuck his tongue into his cheek, executed a wink of profound significance, and then strode over to the Town Crier. Gravely the two clasped hands, and with tears in one another's eyes—"Heaven help him!" cried the one, and "Amen!" the other. And arm in arm they sauntered down the aisle, and passed out into the night.

— An even dozen curd-headed President-makers at Stockton have decided that a jealous wife may slaughter the object of her hate with absolute impunity, without having recourse to the tedious process of previously ascertaining whether or no the "object" has in any manner offended. It is meet that their names should be known, and their virtues recorded: J. W. Smith, a most honorable man; J. A. Golden, a party addicted to milk-and-morality; W. Shine, a thorough gentleman; M. Walthall, a profound scholar; E. R. Allard, an honest person; W. Biven, whom we respect; J. Corvell, beloved of heaven; E. Wright, whom we revere without knowing; W. B. French, a marvel of piety; J. Nightingale, who will please regard us as anxious for the favor of his acquaintance; L. W. Lashley, possessor of a thousand virtues; S. Shackelford, for whom our veneration is spontaneous and unbounded. These gentlemen having all been guilty of perjury (according to the common opinion, which is entirely erroneous), and being a set of unmitigated donkeys (as is falsely asserted by the malevolent), are entitled to our contempt (say the scoffers at virtue), and have honestly earned a coat of tar and feathers each (as the lawless wickedly affirm). We believe that every one of them would steal (if it were but right to do so), and (supposing it to be a Christian duty) we think they would not hesitate to do any cowardly and contemptible act which might be congenial to their natures.

— "Officer Hank Snow," of Grass Valley, displays a zeal for the right that ought to secure him promotion. The other day he arrested a Chinaman with certain stolen goods and chattels in his possession. Mr. Snow shrewdly suspected that he might learn something to the public advantage from this rogue, if only the latter could be induced to confess. So Mr. Snow took him into the woods, and, as is tersely stated by the Nevada Transcript, "strung him up several times." The strangled wretch confessed, and was then turned over to a Justice of the Peace that the law might take its course. The Justice bound him over to answer to the Grand Jury, but "Officer Hank Snow" has not been bound over to answer to anybody. We feel that the demands of justice in his case ought in some way to be satisfied: we will call him a Christian gentleman—a Caucasian—a resident of Grass Valley! If these opprobrious names do not entirely wither him, we have a worse in store—an epithet which carries with it a stigma from which there is no absolution—a disgrace as lasting as it is deep and damnable! This infamous appellation we shall hurl at him as Cambronne hurled a similar death-taunt at the British legions: we shall call him Hank Snow, and may the Lord have mercy on his dishonored soul!

— The Ventura Signal has discovered a mine of sponge. It is feared that the excitement incident to this important discovery may cause the farmers to abandon the cultivation of meerschaum and the manufacture of coal.

California Mines and English Investments.

Time was, in the old days of ignorance and inexperience, when California mines were a byword and an eyesore in the English market. Those were the times when Grass Valley was supposed to be the center of the gold region, and unskilled Directors were sent out with cumbersome machinery, which naturally proved a total failure. It took years to do away with this prejudice against quartz mining, but the truth has at length pierced even through the hard objections of English capitalists, and we rejoice to say they have no reason to regret their return to confidence. Let us take, as one instance, "The Richmond Consolidated Mining Company of London," whereof the mines are situate in Lander County, Eureka District, State of Nevada. These mines were sold to the Company by Mr. J. M. English, and they are now netting twenty-five thousand dollars a month. Two large furnaces are now in course of construction, indeed, are nearly completed, which will increase the net monthly product to $30,000. This is one of the best purchases ever made by a British Company, and Mr. English deserves the thanks of the people on this coast for placing such worthy investments in the hands of foreign capitalists. Such investments as these gain the confidence of the public and pave the way for millions of hoarded wealth to be brought out in aid of the development of our boundless resources.

Bravo, Guglielmo!

Our eloquent Premier can talk like a statesman if he pleases. Witness in his speech, on having been presented with the freedom of Aberdeen, the following passage relative to Irish "Home Rule": "Can any sensible man—any rational man, suppose that at this time of day—in this position of the world—we are going to disintegrate the great capital institutions of this country, for the purpose of making ourselves ridiculous in the sight of all mankind, and crippling any power we possess for bestowing benefits through legislation on the country to which we belong?" This tune goes merrily. 'Tis a snatch of song that might have been sung by Palmerston. Let us hope that neither cajolery, menace, or change of conviction will ever make the singer sing any smaller.—Literary Budget.

— Mr. Anthony Trollope, the well-known novelist, was one of the passengers by the Great Britain. After a stay of about a fortnight in Melbourne, he has left for Queensland, in order to spend a few weeks in that colony before the warm weather sets in. He will return via New South Wales, in a little more than a month, will make a long stay in Victoria, and will endeavor to see all the colonies before his return to Europe, by way of New Zealand and San Francisco. It is understood that Mr. Trollope, with his usual industry, managed to write a novel on board the Great Britain.

— The press has devoted considerable space to reporting the circumstances attending an assault by a shoemaker upon a butcher, during which the latter was stabbed. Whether he died or recovered we do not distinctly remember; we were eating an apple when the item first came under our notice. We know that apple perished miserably, but we don't know anything about shoemakers and butchers.

— Dr. O'Donnell having taken legal steps to ascertain why Governor Haight would not commission him Captain of a militia company, has ascertained. It is because Governor Haight regards him as a scoundrel. There is nothing so satisfactory as accurate and specific knowledge, but this is, we believe, the only instance in which Dr. O'Donnell has acquired it.

— One Robertson has written us, asking our candid opinion as to which is the best advertising medium in California. The Morning Call. An advertisement in that paper—which has a fair circulation—is pretty sure of receiving its just measure of attention. Everybody reads the advertisements in the Call.

The Value of Our Rain-Fall.

The approach of the rainy season is marked by signs of a year favorable for a large reward to the miner and agriculturist, which means a great accession of wealth to the coast at large, and satisfactory profits for dealers and those generally who handle capital with a view to its increase. Physiologists tell us that 85 per cent. of the human frame is water, and quite as large a proportion of that which serves to promote existence and external wealth seems to be of an aqueous nature. Man and animals fade or flourish in proportion to the necessary supply of rain, but it is only the lack of it which brings into bold relief the immense importance of that element of existence. In those countries where Nature deals out the rainfall with a niggardly hand, the efforts to supply it by artificial means demonstrate the great money value of that simple machinery by which Nature raises the waters of the ocean in vapors that, impelled over the land, fall in quantities very generally adapted to the demand. In the experience of California, a little excess in the average fall of rain produces damaging floods and a corresponding deficit spreads desolation where abundance was expected. In the San Joaquin region the land is of surpassing richness but the rain supply is short; the farmers are therefore driven to artificial supplies which bring forth the most amazing abundance. In Kern County an irrigated farm will be encountered amidst a dearth-desolated country, giving the most surprising crops. Such fields yield from six to eight tons of alfalfa per acre, and corn grows 16 to 18 feet high. These results have stimulated vast irrigating enterprises, which will ensure perennial crops throughout that glorious valley. The value of the water may be estimated in that of the crops it promotes; without it the land will not return the seed, whereas with it, the result is 35 bushels per acre, at $1 per bushel—equal to $35. The water is thus really worth $35 per acre. The value of rain-fall on 5,000,000 acres under plow in this State is then $175,000,000 per annum.

With the miners the effect of drouth is the same. No matter how much the placer can pan out, or how prolific the gravel claims, or how rich the quartz, if the water fails the metal defies the art of the miner to extract it. Many millions of the precious metals have been lying unproductive awaiting water, while mine owners have been seeking advances to carry them over, and all the industries of the State languish when mining and agriculture are paralyzed by drouth. In illustration of the effects of rain we may throw together several tables, the figures of which seem to have a mutual dependence upon the number of inches of rain the heavens supply during each year:

Year.	Inches Rain.	Export Grain.	Sales Real Estate.	Savings Deposits.
1863.	13.62
1864.	10.24	$1,660,449
1865.	24.53	1,750,494		$4,381,011
1866.	23.00	6,717,825	$13,666,688	7,005,062
1867.	33.69	12,918,203	17,640,367	10,358,868
1868.	33.53	12,218,345	27,217,026	17,165,597
1869.	21.35	11,514,335	29,937,711	22,345,508
1870.	19.15	9,938,987	15,630,272	29,842,212
1871.	12.57	7,634,867	7,981,101	34,541,591

1862 was the year of flood, the two succeeding were years of drouth, which so shrunk up the grain production that there was not enough for home consumption. There was much imported and re-exported. In the year 1865 the rain fall resumed its average, and the grain surplus rose in quantity and value each succeeding year. Aided by the prosperity of the miners, the amount of capital seeking investment is indicated in the transactions in real estate, which culminated in 1869, the last year of a full rain supply. The general prosperity flowing from that abundance of natural wealth is indicated in the amount of savings deposits. The supply of water in the last two years has become less, and a corresponding depression in values and restriction in trade have prevailed. The savings deposits have shown no declension, because sustained by the accumulation of interest. At present, with the great extension of railroads throughout the State, laying open larger tracts of land, with the prospect of a high average price for grain, the enterprise of farmers has been stimulated, and the value of the water which promises to fall this year will have far higher figures and produce more animating effects than ever. We may look for an unprecedented cereal crop, for wool clips which will maintain the character of California wool and realize high prices; cattle, poultry, wines and fruits will all compensate the growers for the losses of the last two years, and the mine prospects are far greater than ever before in this as well as in neighboring States, and the same results, manifest in the above table, that attended the rains of '68 and '69, may be looked for this year in extended proportion.

— A list of two hundred books which it is proposed to purchase for the library of the Lincoln School has been referred to a committee of the Board of Education, with power to reject any objectionable volumes. As it is not probable that the members of the committee are familiar with a half-dozen volumes comprised in this list or any other, it may reasonably be affirmed that a conscientious performance of their duty will require the first intellectual labor they have ever done in all their lives. It is to be hoped the works are printed in large, clear type, with the syllables properly estranged.

Taken Away.

AN IDYLL OF MEMORIES.

Three summers ago through the meadows Oh, would that my spirit could follow
 We first went hand in hand : In search of my lost love again,
 While love's halo hovered around us, On the wings of that triumph of glory
 Like a gleam from the Golden Land. That hovered around him then :
 Oh, merrily sang the sky-lark ! For a halo hung over that parting
 And merrily danced the rill ! That I felt yet my words could not phrase,
 And bright was the bloom of the heather And now, oh, it seems all the brighter
 On the brow of the purpled hill. In the light of those bygone days.
 We strayed 'neath the deepening shadows, For Death did not kill his calm power
 Far down in the fern-clad dells, When it fell with a chill on his brow ;
 While the distant chimes were mellowed And it's not all a quenchless sorrow
 To the tinkle of fairy bells. That lies in that churchyard now :
 And the first cold sigh of the twilight For yet he shines o'er my sad spirit,
 Came over the wold afar, [son Like the gleam of a distant star,
 While the night-gale's full-voiced chan- To light my dark way as I wander,
 Was trilled to the evening star. And beckon me on from afar.
 Oh, merrily still we wandered, Far off in heaven's glory I know it,
 Like the fabled lovers of yore, Though my eyes are dim with tears ;
 Till our hands forever were parted, And I'll walk by the light that it gives me,
 And the meadows were sweet no more : 'Mid the gloom of my desolate years,
 For the earth was robbed of its glory, And I'll cherish a truth in my bosom,
 When the damp chill fell on his brow ; Greater than Sorrow can kill,
 And the Past, that sowed my heart's ease, That the love that was mine in the meadows
 Has only rue for me now. Is the love that comes down to me still.

The European and North American Railway.

On October 19th, the President of the United States, the Governor-General of Canada, and a host of distinguished companions assisted at the opening of the European and North American Railway. The line, whose partial completion was attended with such unusual clat, is not unworthy of its ambitious title, or of the prediction indulged in by its illustrious sponsors. The president of the line claimed that it must forever be the shortest connecting link between London and San Francisco; while Postmaster-General Crosswell promised that, when completed, it should be the chosen highway of the European mails of the United States. To this practical talk was added much in reference to the era of international brotherhood, and to the "union by an iron band" between Canada and the United States. The international character of the road is an accomplished fact, inasmuch as it already connects Bangor, Me., with St. John, N.B. Its European character has yet to be developed, since the connection between St. John and Halifax will require about a year to complete, and the necessary line of steamers between Halifax and England cannot, until then, receive a fair trial. What has been done is to bring St. John twelve hours nearer Boston than heretofore, to open up the great and fertile valley of the Aroostook to intercourse with the outer world, and to bring the entire trade of New England and New Brunswick into much closer relation than was hitherto possible. What will be effected when the entire stretch of 466 miles between Bangor and Halifax is completed will be briefly as follows: Boston will then be little more than 700 miles from Halifax, and New York will be about 950 miles. It is promised that passengers and mails can be transferred from New York to an ocean steamer at Halifax in about forty hours. A day and a half will thus be saved from the duration of the passage to Europe, and the ocean passage will be lessened by about three days. Results still more important are promised should St. John, Newfoundland, be brought within the range of the railroad and the steamships. This harbor is but 1,600 miles, or four and a half to five days' passage distant from Valentia, in Ireland, and the promoters of the extension of the scheme claim that London would, by this route, be placed within seven days of New York, eight days of Chicago, and twelve of San Francisco. The construction of the transcontinental line would give the present road a still more brilliant future in relation to the trade of two hemispheres. Meanwhile, its promoters have a fair chance of being abundantly remunerated by the trade which the newly constructed line will create in the district which it has opened up.—Scottish American Journal.

—Some remarks by a writer in the Overland Monthly, concerning the beneficial influence of the Press, have suggested into our impossible intellect the following REFLECTIONS: Reflection 1—The beneficent influence of the Press is most talked about by the Press. Reflection 2—If the Press were less evenly divided upon all social, political and moral questions the influence of its beneficence would be greater than it is. Reflection 3—The beneficence of its influence would be more marked. Reflection 4—If the Press were more wise and righteous than it is, it would escape the reproach of being more foolish and wicked than it should be. (Reflection 5—The foregoing Reflection is not an identical proposition). Reflection 6—(a) The influence of the Press cannot be purchased for money. (b) It can if you have enough money.

Letters from London.

LONDON (Eng.) Oct. 14th, 1871.

EDITOR MAIL BAG:—When Bishop Wilkins prophesied that "the time will come when men will as commonly call for their wings as they do now for their boots," he, like Galileo before him, was probably condemned by the verdict of an unbelieving age; yet the problem of aerial motion, rising superior to scepticism and ridicule, is year by year gaining on the attention of mechanists and thinkers. A writer in the Cornhill Magazine, for October, has treated this subject in a most amusing and instructive manner. Whether David, in a leisure moment snatched from slaughtering the Philistine, ever devoted himself to the elucidation of this problem, or poured forth his lamentation and regret at failure in the verses, "O that I had the wings of a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest," is a question which, at this distance of time, must be left unanswered; but there can be no doubt that, from time immemorial during the history of man, to emulate the bird, and to navigate the air has been one of the most intense aspirations of the human breast. So long a period has now elapsed since the success of the balloon solved the problem of aerial flotation, that we may reasonably expect to advance soon to the second position in the science and learn to navigate what we have already learned to float. It is here that the writer in the Cornhill Magazine takes up the history of flying; and setting aside balloons as possible navigators of the air, for the reason that they must necessarily be so many times larger than any machine to which they can be attached (the proportion between the size of the balloon intended to carry one person, and the size of the human body is about as one thousand to one,) he boldly proceeds to consider whether buoyancy is a necessary attribute of flying creatures, or a desirable feature in flying machines. The structure of birds, bats, and insects has been supposed by some to be such as to secure actual buoyancy, to a greater or less degree; and many would be disposed, at a first view of the matter, to regard the hollow bones and the quill-feathers of birds as evidences that buoyancy is essential to flight. "But it appears to us," says the writer, "that on a careful consideration of the structure of flying creatures, the hollow portions of their bodies will be found to fulfill a purpose quite distinct from that of imparting buoyancy. If we examine a quill we find that the most remarkable feature which it presents to us, is the proportion which its strength bears to its weight. In the hollow bones, again, we see the same association of strength and lightness. Precisely, as a tubular bridge, like that which spans the Menai Straits, is capable of bearing far greater strain than a solid metal bar of equal weight and length, so the hollow bones of birds are far stronger than solid bones of equal weight would be. We see, then, that lightness is secured in these parts of a bird's structure. But lightness and buoyancy are different matters." As his incapacity to carry the requisite extent of supporting surface has been regarded as the greatest difficulty in the way of man's attempts at flight, one is led to inquire whether a smaller extent of wing-surface than has hitherto been deemed necessary may not suffice for him. We shall assist our inquiries in this direction by observing the relations between the weight and the supporting surface of different winged creatures. M. de Lucy, of Paris, asserts, that the smaller and lighter the winged animal is, the greater is the extent of supporting surface; and that the crane of Australia, which weighs three hundred and thirty-nine times more than the sparrow, has a relative wing-surface seven times less. After all it is to our neglect in observing the difference in strength between the breast muscles of a man and those of a bird that our failures in the art of flying have been hitherto due. Man's breast muscles are far less powerful than those of a bird, and yet they are alone called into action by affixing pinions to the arms. M. Besnier was fully aware of this; and a notice of his experiments here transcribed is instructive as well as amusing. "He (M. Besnier) at the close of the last century, employed, in his attempts to fly, those powerful muscles of the arm which are used in supporting a weight over the shoulder (as, for instance, when a brick-layer carries a hod). In his method a long rod passed over each shoulder, folding pinions being attached to both ends of each rod. When either end of a rod was drawn down the descending pinion opened, the ascending pinion at the other end closing; and the two rods were worked by alternate downward pulls with the arms and legs. The downward pull with the arms was exceedingly effective, but the downward pull with the legs was feeble. Yet, even with this imperfect contrivance, Besnier achieved a partial success. His pinions did not, indeed, serve to raise him in the air; but when, by a sharp run forward, he had brought that aerial supporting power into action, of which we have spoken above, the pinions, sharply worked, so far sustained him as to allow him to cross a river of considerable width." Of course it is an enormous mistake to imagine that a man by mere free will and the addition of some contrived apparatus can, at his first attempt, balance himself in the air. This would be a miracle, and the age of miracles is past. But on the other hand, the age of science is young, and the grandchildren of the men who invented the railroad and the steamship may not unreasonably expect to navigate the air. From the foregoing, the truth of the principle of your Avator is corroborated. Now I am once on the subject of magazine literature, I must mention the termination this month of the experiences of a "Victim of Paris and Versailles," which were commenced in Macmillan's of September. An editorial note to the first article assures the world of the good faith of the writer, but adds that for obvious reasons his name cannot be divulged. I have been made acquainted with the facts of the case, but am not permitted to say more than that the writer is a mere boy, the son of an English gentleman of good position, who borrowed five pounds and went to Paris for "a spree." He arrived, as he relates, on the 29th of March, 1871, and on the 10th of April, having no passport to prove his identity, he was pressed to serve the Commune, in whose service he remained until the capture of Paris by the Versailles troops, by whom he was made prisoner and sent to Brest. Here he remained at the hulks until the influence of his relatives procured his release. His revelations are so startling and his evidence so circumstantial, that he would have been an important witness at the Courts Martial at Versailles. Indeed, by his own account, he spoke to the officer of the Commune who was in the act of firing the Mairie. A notable fact in his narrative is his utter disbelief in the existence of the so-called pétroleuses, who existed simply in the over-heated imagination of the Parisians. Yet this imagination cost dearly the wretched women who were "publicly disgraced" and brutally murdered—for a name. The Rev. T. Selby Watson has published a very powerful edition of "A Lesson for Wives." The following is his own account of the drama: "In a fit of fury I have killed my wife. Often and often have I endeavored to restrain myself, but my rage overcame me and I struck her down. Her body will be found in the little room off the library." As Mr. Watson is not only a venerable clergyman, but also a distinguished author, his crime is likely to infuse an interest into the daily papers. Yours,

LONDON (England), October 21st, 1871.

On Tuesday last, October 17th, the anniversary of the day—just seventeen years ago—on which Sir John Burgoyne, as Chief of the Engineering Staff, decided on the bombardment of Sebastopol, his remains were followed by a brilliant cortège of mourners to their last resting place within the dingy precincts of the Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula, in the Tower of London. Besides General Hardinge and Sir William Knollys representing the Queen and the Prince of Wales, M. Van de Velde was present on behalf of the King and the Belgians. The excitement of the day is a reported conservative alliance, offensive and defensive, with the working-men against the government of Mr. Gladstone, whose iniquities seem to have wearied the patience of men on earth and God in Heaven. Adversity is said to make us acquainted with strange bed-fellows, but a stranger shaking-of-hands than this was never seen between the ermine and the fustian, the strawberry leaves of the Duke and the sprouts of the coster-monger. It is just possible that this league, if league really exists—has been cemented with a view to future events and the march of progress, so that when the workman emits the Egyptians—in other words, when the aristocracy come to be "improved" off the face of the earth—these Israelites may show the covenant on their door-posts, and the Destroyer may pass them by on that day. The Kreutz Zeitung reports from Heligoland that there have recently arrived in that island from England several twelve-pounder Armstrong guns and one forty-pounder. This is rather startling intelligence. Heligoland, as your readers are aware, is an island belonging to us in the German Ocean, a few hours steam from Hamburg, where, on the principle we habitually exercise of shutting our eyes to what is naughty, we have established an excellent hell. I should say the gaming establishment is a principal feature there, its croupiers and the functionaries of the Etablissement des Bains constituting the population of the island. Fortifications—there were none when I was in Heligoland, but an old gun planted in the Governor's garden exerted a certain moral force. Indeed, in 1863, when a Prussian corvette and a Danish frigate were about to engage in close proximity to the island, i. e. in British waters, the Governor, with the help of his servant, let off this ancient piece of artillery as a warning to the belligerents, who immediately sheered off in dismay. As London fills by little and little, theaters are beginning to put on less the appearance of East-End Churches, and managers, with whom hope is always superior to experience, are competing with one another in producing novelties in anticipation of the winter season. The deplorable suicide of Mr. Walter Montgomery, after a short but disastrous management of the Gaiety Theater, when Shakespeare was the piece de resistance, is likely to deter other managers from trying to "purify and elevate the tone of the British stage," and will impress upon their minds more firmly than before that "Byron spells ruin and Shakespeare bankruptcy." Indeed, when I mention that Barry Sullivan made £18,000 in Bourke street, Melbourne, and lost the same sum by equally good performances in London, you may judge that the supremacy of the "Burlesque" over the "Beautiful" is too powerful to be easily resisted. Zoology, in the shape of Circuses, has always numbered many patrons in this country, and Mr. Hengler has now opened a new establishment for equine amusements in the building that for some inexplicable reason has gone by the name of the Palais Royal, in Argyll street. Miss Hengler, no doubt, forms the chief attraction, and, from what I have heard, it seems not improbable that "a youthful scion of a noble house" may soon succumb a willing captive to the prowess of this fair Amazon. Hanna: or, The Child of Fire, in the fair person of Mlle. Pitteri, is now airing her graceful proportions in the congenial atmosphere of the "Circo" at Madrid. Across the "silver streak of sea" comes the murmur of a "storm in a tea-cup" in Paris at the production of the Viète des Noces, by M. Dumas' fils. The Parisian journals are indulging in the habit the "Devil when sick," etc., and are going in largely for remorse. L'Union (a Paris journal) says the play in question "contains enough immorality in one act to make a Zouave blush." Fancy the modest Zouave! Figure to yourself the bashful Turco! After all it is a dish that has been often set before the Parisian public, the principle being the embodiment of the well-known determination of Mrs. Haller: Quoth she, "I'll remember the words of my Bible: My husband's a stranger and I'll take him in." In exemplification of the sterility of the times, Mr. Punch is represented in the journal of that name for this week, spurning with indignation the various daily and weekly papers which are scattered at his feet, while underneath the cartoon is written, "Nothing in the Papers." Yours, B.

The Streamlet.

With thankless toil,
With wild turmoil,
Harassed, dejected, weary,
I sought this glen,
Remote from men,
This refuge bright and cheery.
This verdant mound,
With daisies crowned,
Repose and peace will yield me.
Kind nature, smile,
My cares beguile,
From ev'ry sorrow shield me!
Deep, peaceful calm,
The spirit's balm,
Here quells all thought of sadness.
A merry stream,
Like some bright dream,
Contents the heart with gladness.
A blithesome song
It pours along,
Each wave instinct with pleasure;
Dull, earthly mind,
How mayst thou find
Such rare and priceless treasure?
Through woodland shade,
Through mossy glade,
O'er rocky barrier springing,
It winds its way
To outer day,
The forest-perfumes bringing.
Along the fields
Whose beauty yields
Delights forever teeming,
Through summer days,
Content it strays,
In mellow sunshine gleaming.

Upon its breast
No stains may rest,
No shadows make it dreary;
But, pure and bright,
In flashing light,
It gambols, never weary.
Bright stream, teach me
Thy laughter free;
Make known thy secret story;
Reveal me lays
Of cloudless days,
And moonlight's silver glory.
The echoes die!
No soft reply
Ascends in blissful greeting.
The happy rill
Glides onward still,
The unknown song repeating.
Yet earth and air,
And streamlet fair,
Glad tidings are revealing.
All nature's face
Is full of grace;
Her smiles are full of healing.
Yet not in vain
I've musing lain,
To dreamy fancies clinging;
From all around
There breathes a sound
Of tuneful voices ringing.
Remote and deep,
As thoughts in sleep,
Are all these mystic voices;
But in the light
Of spirit-sight
My grateful heart rejoices.

The Price of Muscular Culture.

The sins appertaining unto the musclemen of the Olympic Club are being visited upon them with a woful vengeance. Anarchy reigns supreme among them: they are engaged in a lively clapperclawing, the cause and motive whereof no outsider can hope to understand, and the sense whereof he needs not expect to discern. This animated wrangle has gone to such a length that suit has been brought by certain of the disaffected to dissolve the concern and compel a division of the assets. We have taken frequent occasion to warn these brawny young gentlemen that nature's laws might not be violated with impunity; that dumb-bells, clubs, parallel bars and such like vanities tended to the development of the muscles but the discouragement of the brain. Our voice fell upon long but unheeding ears, and behold the result: a brood of athletic giants and intellectual pigmies—a bevy of shapely young men with knotted muscles, arms of iron and nerves of corded steel, and without sense enough to manage their own affairs. The evil is of a character to correct itself if you give it time. The dissolution of the Club will compel each individual member to contort and musculate upon his own private hook, and without the advantage of a gymnasium. The results will be temperate contortion and imperfect musculation. Then the dormant brain will gradually resume its sway, intellection will set in, and in a few years these young gentlemen will again know enough to go in when it rains.

— The reputed publisher of the Alaska Herald—a cheerful party, whose name, by a rather significant coincidence, signifies "skunk"—accuses certain gentlemen of having tried to "blackmail" him. This is true to the following extent: Mr. Sk— (we beg pardon for the insult we were about to repeat upon a comparatively inoffensive animal) went to the gentleman alluded to, and offered to burn a damaging document he had freshly forged if he were paid three thousand dollars for the match which it would be necessary to consume. "Sir," said the gentleman, rising from his chair, "money is no object, but I decline to treat with you upon that basis. Pardon my allusion to what must be a delicate subject, but I perceive you have a nose—a nose of peculiar configuration and singularly fascinating aspect. Now, it never could have been intended by nature that you should have a monopoly of that organ; we must enjoy it in common. Preliminary to any negotiation I must be permitted a tweak at that snout." As this proposition was rather hastily declined by way of a convenient back door, the matter remains in statu quo.

Special Brevities.

— Mr. George Potter, the notorious trades-unionist, writes to the London Times on Monarchy, Republicanism, and Democracy. He states that while a great number are in favor of a Republic, he believes that if certain broad measures were passed it would stall off the necessity of a change of government. The first is a retrenchment in the Civil List; secondly, a thorough reform of the Upper House; next a readjustment of the electoral suffrage, to depend for its extent on the success of the ballot; then a complete disestablishment and disendowment of the English Church—his two last points being headed the land question and the claims of the people. Mr. Potter contends that the American Republic is cheaper than the British Monarchy; and speaking of the land question, he insists that true justice will never be done until every man is bound at death to divide what he has equally between his wife and his children. In conclusion, the writer believes that the just claims of the people will never be understood until in Parliament they may be explained, advocated, and defended, with the assistance of representatives from among themselves. The Times thinks the letter, on the whole, will be read with satisfaction, as reflecting a point of view widely remote from that of Continental anarchists.

— What is amber? At a remote epoch of creation, classified by geologists as the Tertiary Period, a mighty pine forest covered vast portions of the northern continent. A resin, so rapid in its flow as to catch forms of insect life in every moment of action, exuded from these pines, and congealed as rapidly. By some natural-historic process not yet fully cleared up, these masses of resin were detached from their parent trees, and became submerged under the great Tertiary sea, where a stratum of bluish clay formed round them. Then came the subsequent strata of diluvial and alluvial periods, and the peninsula of Samland, rising gradually from the waters, held buried under it a portion of the amber treasure, while other portions of it stretch beneath the basin of the Baltic from Memel to Pillau.—St. Paul's.

— A late London letter contains the following gossip about Americans in that city: "Miss May Alcott, of Concord, Mass., sister of the author of 'Little Women,' has taken up her residence in London for the study of pictorial art. Many of the best illustrations of the London illustrated journals and magazines are from drawings by Mr. Hennessey, an American artist, who came to this country last year and has settled at Vine House, Chiswick. The drawings are admirable, but they are merely episodes of much more serious tasks. Mr. Hennessey is engaged upon a picture of Walt Whitman strolling by the shore of New York Harbor, which is to appear in the new Oxford monthly."

— It is reported from Ningpo that the Chinese authorities are showing great activity in fortifying the approaches to that port. The crest of the hill above Chin-hai is covered with houses for military officers; while in a sheltered place in the low ground arrangements are being rapidly made for a camp of 25,000 men. A gentleman who had recently sailed up the river Yung counted eight double sets of forts between Chin-hai and Ningpo, commanding the river from either bank and with converging fires. From the same source the Shanghai Courier hears that a camp of 50,000 men is to be gathered near Shanghai—in the neighborhood of the Arsenal, it is said.

— In England it is notified that passages to New Zealand—the future Great Britain of the Pacific Ocean—can be obtained on as favorable terms as to the United States. New Zealand is larger than Great Britain. Its climate, in the northern parts, resembles that of the south of France; while in the more southern portions it may be compared to the south of England. New Zealand has no long winters with their bitter frosts and deep snows to stop agricultural operations for four months of the year, and reduce the laborer to live in the winter on the savings of summer.

— John Bull sends forth a loud and ominous growl from China. His "life and property" are insecure in the Central Flowery Land, and he demands protection and redress. The truth is that Hindostan is not big enough for "John." He is eager to get a firm foothold inside of the Great Wall, in order that he may go to work building railroads, opening mines and exploring generally in the Orient. Civilization would be benefited perhaps by his success; but it is a very difficult matter to make the Chinese think so.

— A street car dummy is to be tried in Detroit. The car is so arranged that the engine consumes its own smoke and steam, and moves along the street noiselessly and smoothly. The cost of running it is four-fifths less than by horsepower. One dollar per day will keep it in fuel, and two men can run it. It is so arranged that the engine only occupies surplus room under the floor of the car, it being somewhat higher than ordinary cars.

— Mr. Holloway, the famous purveyor of ointment and pills, intends to devote part of his enormous fortune to charitable purposes. He is now looking for a suitable site upon which to found, at a cost of half a million, an institution for some class of persons in need of assistance. Mr. Holloway intends to become a second Peabody. This large fortune has been made entirely by the force of advertising.

— The ratio of suicides has been established by M. Decaine recently before the French Academy of Sciences. It is in London only 1 in 175 deaths; in New York, 1 in 172; in Vienna, 1 in 160; but in Paris it has reached 1 in 72. The number of suicides from drunkenness, which in 1848 was 141 for all France, reached 401 in 1866. We doubt the accuracy of all these figures.

— The efficacy of the mitrailleur as a weapon of defence, we hear, has been very much increased by an invention of Captain C. P. Stone, late 77th Reg't, R.A., in which atmospheric pressure is used as a motor for giving it an elevating and depressing action above and below the parapet, characteristic of the Moncrieff principle. He proposes also the application of this principle for the treatment of heavy guns, a proposal which offers many novel advantages. The same inventor has also discovered a method by which submerged torpedoes may be destroyed without hazard to the operator. Capt. Stone has hitherto refrained from submitting his plans to the Government, in order that they should first pass the ordeal of a rigorous scrutiny by certain high mathematical authorities, whose verdict has been given very decidedly in their favor.—London Overland Mail.

— An important step toward railroad consolidation was accomplished recently in London by the union "for working purposes" of the London and Northwestern and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railroads. The combined length of these two roads is about 2,000 miles, and their aggregate capital is over $400,000,000. As they transact about a fifth part of the entire railway business of the United Kingdom, it will be the biggest undertaking of the kind in the world; and the London Spectator holds that "it is a great step towards a single center of management for the English railway system—the greatest reform of that nature that could well be conceived."

— Charles Lefevre, the popular French gentleman who races under this assumed name, has just come in for a fortune of over half a million sterling, left him by a cousin whom he never saw in his life. The gentleman in question died in America, whither he emigrated many years ago with the sum of £500, which Mr. Lefevre's father lent him when all his other relatives turned their backs upon him. He settled in that country, and amassed the great wealth he has left to the son of his benefactor, who has had to pay the bagatelle of £1,200 for legacy duty.

— It is said that there are two fig trees standing in a garden, on the banks of the Tuolumne river, near the town of La Grange, which measure  $7\frac{1}{2}$  feet in circumference, and are about 40 feet high. These trees stand only eight feet apart, and mingle their redundant branches as in one tree. These twin trees are thirteen years old, and are of remarkable thrift and beauty.—Sacramento Union.

— It is now stated that electricity will correct the hue of a ruddy nose, tempering it to a delicate pink, or blanching it to the semblance of cream cheese, according to the strength of the charge. This is probably the reason so many people go about the house with "a brow like a thunder cloud"—they are bleaching their snouts.

— One firm in Philadelphia employs three hundred hands in making four million artificial teeth per annum. This is the largest manufactory of the kind in existence, and the products of the concern are exported to every part of the civilized world where the arts and sciences have made any progress.

— Recent developments made by the aid of telegraphic communication proves that San Francisco was four minutes further west from Greenwich than had heretofore been supposed—the old calculation being 8 hours 9 minutes 34.19 seconds, and the present being 8 hours 9 minutes and 33.13 seconds.

— The total product of gold and silver in the United States for the year 1870, as estimated by Mr. R. W. Raymond, United States commissioner of mining statistics, reached $66,000,000, California contributing $25,000,000 and Nevada $16,000,000 to this amount.

— Last month the value of beer and ale exported from England was £118,799. The largest quantity was dispatched to India, and the next best supply to Australia, where, in the last nine months, beer and ale to the value of £241,263 were forwarded.

— Mr. Ramrao Govind, extra assistant commissioner of Bassein, Hindostan, has been fired at, and his establishment of three karkoons have been wounded by the sword of a police sepoy in the character of an aggrieved suitor.

— The American Treasury Department decides that a vessel built in the United States and sent to England to receive her engines, must be considered as entirely foreign built, and not entitled to American registry.

— Mrs. Alfred Gatty has got hold of a capital subject, "Sundials," and will shortly publish a volume upon them, containing a large number of examples and inscriptions, with illustrations.

— The Liberté states that the Bank of France is about to put into circulation a sum of 35,000,000 of francs in silver coin, and to afford additional accommodation for the exchange of notes.

— Mdlle. Schneider, who is in Paris, has just been presented by an unknown gentleman (who is said to be an Englishman), with a magnificent gold and diamond comb worth £8,000 sterling.

— From July 1st to November 1st, our internal revenue receipts were $48,900,730; that is at the rate of $12,225,182 per month, or $146,702,204 per year.

— We have no respect for the man who endeavors to justify the murder of his wife by the shallow plea that "everybody does it." It is not true.

— Great Britain exported during the first nine months of 1871, 2,570,000,000 yards of cotton piece goods of the value of £40,000,000.

— The Bank of England has reduced the rate of discount from 5 to 4 per cent.—an indication of an easier turn to the money market.

An Autumn Reverie.

Shrill through the russet trees
Whistles the autumn breeze:
Summer is dead.
Leaves from the boughs around
Wither, and on the ground
Lifeless are shed.

Rich is the autumn glow;
But the wind whispers low
Of winter near.
Winter will pass away,
Darkness gives place to day,
Once more the summer ray
Gladdening the year.

Day follows nature's night,
Sorrow may breed delight,
And from above
Sunshine may soon restore
Winter's thefts—never more
To me, my love!

Flowers they may bloom again,
Washed by the vernal rain,
On sunshine fed;
Earth may regain her hue,
Summer cannot renew
Love that is dead.

Book Notices.

We have received from A. Roman & Co. a beautifully gotten up Red Line Edition of "Burns Poetical Works," with thirty-two illustrations, published by Lee & Shepard, Boston. Also, from the same publishers, "Dramas and Dialogues," from Dickens; arranged by W. Eliot Fette, A. M., and well adapted for school purposes and parlor theatricals.

"The Spark of Genius; or, The College Life of James Traiton," by Elijah Kellogg, author of the "Elm Island Stories."

"Fire in the Woods," by Professor James de Milles; the fourth volume of the "B. O. W. C." series.

Any of these volumes will be highly appreciated by the boys at Christmas. For the girls we have three new volumes of the "Kathie Stories," by Miss A. M. Douglass, finely illustrated: "Kathie's Soldiers," "In the Ranks," "Kathie's Harvest Days."

In addition to these we have received "The Children's Sunday Album," by the author of a "Trap to Catch a Sunbeam," etc.; and "The Children's Album," by Uncle John. These two volumes each contain over 150 illustrations, and are published by Lee & Shepard, of Boston. Their handsome binding, elegant engravings, and excellence throughout in anecdote, moral and story, will be a perfect delight to the little folks, and a capital gift for the holidays.

— The present year has been a bad one for ecclesiastical impertinence. The American and English evangelickers who attempted to instruct the Czar relative to certain defects in his government, were frostily cut by that potentate, and returned like the vagrant sheep of the youthful Bo-Peep. Moussegneur Frauche, whom the Pope lately dispatched to Stamboul to teach religious toleration to the Sultan, has had no better success: the Sublime Porte got himself astride the high-horse and declined an interview. Apparently the effete monarchs appertaining unto the crumbling despotisms and tottering thrones of the Old World have conspired to maintain for a brief season longer an attitude of godless indifference to the wishes of the foreign faithful. Let us comfort our Christian souls by praying that the selfish scoundrels may be mercifully forgiven.

— A gentleman who is suspected of insanity has been committed to the Asylum. His idea is that the devil is in him, and he wishes to find the Virgin to cure him. It is just as well that he is gone to the Asylum: it is not likely that in San Francisco he would find any virgin of sufficient age to undertake his restoration to health.

— The present French Government has been guilty of several grave offenses against humanity, but it cannot be taxed with vindictiveness. Some thousands of Communist prisoners, who might easily have been put to death, have been mercifully confined in hulks, and permitted to perish of typhus and scurvy.

— We are glad to know that among the young people of Oakland the religious interest is deepening and spreading. — Pacific. [Our contemporary is correct; no longer ago than last year we saw a bevy of young Oaklanders contending for the possession of a candy angel.

A Story of the Mines.

[From London Fun.]

"Did you ever make any grand coup at the mines?" I asked of a Californian—Milton V. Harbur by name—whose acquaintance I had made as we were traveling "on the cars," as he described it, between London and Liverpool.

"Well," said he, "I guess I was pretty near it once. The nearest chance that I can remember was when a lot of us clubbed together to invest in some new mines that had just started up the country, and promised mighty well, and what's more, stuck to their promise as it turned out afterwards. That was when I was located at the City of — on the coast, about which, by the by, a countryman of yours sent me a very pretty epigram for the paper I edited there.

"This country of perennial fruits,
Grapes, melons, strawberries, and taters,
Outstrips the old world's seven-league boots
With Golden Gate-ers."

"You may not be aware," continued the Californian, "that what you call boots over here we call gaiters."

I admitted the epigram was happy, and he went on with his story.

"There were six or eight of us connected with various papers there that used to meet pretty often, and pretty much constituted a little society all to ourselves. Well, we talked over these mines together, and most of us were anxious to get on that speculation. Some weren't worth very much, and none of us was worth any great pile; but we settled it that we'd get our dollars together, and that one of us should take the heap, and go to the mines, and see for himself. If things didn't look like a rich find, he was just to make tracks back again, but if it panned out well he was to go the pile. We fixed a day for handing in the dollars, and for very obvious reasons—some of us having got to get the dollars—we fixed the very day when the vessel sailed that was to take our man over the bay. We chose Washington P. Blaine, of The Pioneer, for our delegate, partly because he was popular amongst us, and partly because he knew something of the mines up country. It was agreed we were to dine together on the night before he started; and so when the time came we met and dined, and sat with him until about midnight. The ship was to sail between one and two in the morning.

"At twelve we separated, having handed over to Washington the sum we had put together—and almighty smart work it had been for most of us to get up to time. Anyhow, we had done it, and there was the produce of our labor deposited in Washington P. Blaine's pocket-book; and we all looked forward to the day when it would return considerably multiplied and increased, in that same receptacle.

"I didn't sleep much that night, and when I did close my eyes it was to dream of striking it rich at the mines. I was up pretty early, for I couldn't lie in bed. Well, the very first person I met on the street as I turned out was Washington P. Blaine, coming along the sidewalk, whistling softly to himself, and looking as fresh as a penny. "Hullo, Wash." I sung out, "what's on? Missed the boat?" "How are ye, old hoss?" said he, "let's liquor!" So we turned into the nearest bar, and Washington called for two drinks, and then I noticed he gave the bar-keeper the wink to chalk it up. "Well," said he, turning to me after he'd tossed off his drink, "you fellows left me too soon last night. I'd got more than an hour before the boat started, and as I was strolling along Hostetter street, I just looked in at Clancy's. —Clancy's was the biggest of the many gambling saloons that were open all night—" Well, what then, Wash?" I asked, "what about the pile?" "Why, I put it all on the ace," said he; adding, after a moment's pause, "and she didn't win!"

"By Jove!" I said, staring at my Californian in wonder; "what did you fellows do to him?"

"Wal, stranger," he said, very deliberately, "I guess we huffed—some!"

—The spectacle of Mr. Brigham Young, by the grace of God Prophet and Patriarch, moving solemnly southward with his doughty men-at-arms, is a moderately touching one. As was neatly observed by Mr. Mark Antony: "If any party happens to have on hand a surplus of tears, he will hardly find a fitter occasion than the present for emitting them." To refuse to flood the sympathetic eye with a wealth of weep is niggardly to the verge of meanness. The writer of this is himself tolerably mean, but not to that extent. He can gaze unruffled upon the flurry of a stricken whale, and withhold his heart from an elephant tortured with the pains of colic. The writhing incident to the bisection of an earth-worm fails to provoke his sympathy, and the shrieks of an infant undergoing the maternal palm do not impress him. But this prophet of the Most High, streaking it across the border with the keys of Heaven jingling merrily in the tail pocket of his coat—this revealer, expounder and enforcer of the Divine Will, shinning over the sage-brush country in terror of a human writ—this is enough to draw salt water from the eye of the most stoical potatoe, and make a wooden Indian to burst into his handkerchief. If we do not blubber it is because history has made us familiar with so many similar instances, that we have become a trifle callous of soul.

—It is reported by telegraph that the cholera in Constantinople is spreading. We are happy to correct this painful statement: the cholera has invested the city and is closing in.

Empty Arms.

God's blessing on the stalwart arms
That hold their labor duty,
And bear the burdens of the hour
With cheerfulness and beauty!

All honor to the willing arms
That lift the poor and lowly,
And teach us by their kindness
A lesson pure and holy!

And raptures for the glowing arms
That clasp, with loving sweetness,
A world of joy and tenderness
In beautiful completeness!

And rest unto the weary arms
That after pining sadness
Twine round our dear returning ones,
And thrill again with gladness!

But sorrow for the longing arms
Where hope, like birds, have nested:
God's pity for the empty arms
Where darling ones have rested!

—George Cooper.

Tweed's Guilt.

Mr. Samuel J. Tilden has brought Tweed's guilt home to him by a remarkable piece of work. The Ring got inserted in the charter a clause creating a county "Board of Audit," composed of their precious selves. The "Board" met once for but ten minutes, and turned the whole "auditing" business over to Tweed. This sounds like a joke, but is true. Tweed then went to work, and "audited" as hard as he could, Garvey and other scamps bringing in the raw material in the shape of "claims," and he never stopped till he had "audited" about $6,000,000 worth. Connolly's part in the little game then came in, and that worthy citizen drew his warrants for the money, which that simple-minded "scholar and gentleman" the Mayor indorsed, without having the least idea what was going on. Another citizen named Woodward, holding a subordinate office in the Supervisor's office, but living in luxury at Norwalk, Connecticut, then took the warrants down to the Broadway Bank, having forged on the back of them any names of which his own or Garvey's graceful fancy had suggested the insertion in the body of the document. Here he divided up the sum among the confederates by making deposits to their credit. Unluckily for Tweed, he, Garvey and Ingersoll kept their accounts at the same bank as Woodward, and Mr. Tilden, getting hold of the books of the bank, "decomposed" the deposits, as he says, and brought Tweed's share of the plunder home to him—about $1,000,000 in all. The Joint Committee have reported on the condition of the city's finances, and declare that the discoverable stealings of three years are $19,000,000, which is probably only half the real total.—The Nation of November 2d.

— From late advices by the Moses Taylor we learn that in Australia the revelation concerning the threatened burning of the world by one Summerfield, with a combustible pill, is regarded as a hoax. It seems impossible that so intelligent a people as the Australians can be so stupidly incredulous. The story originated in San Francisco, and we can solemnly assure our Australian friends that it is absolutely true. It having been falsely stated that the diabolical plot was discovered and exposed by W. H. Rhoades, of this city, we hasten to correct that error; the credit is due to the Rev. Mark Twain, of Hartford, Conn., as is clearly established by the following note received by us: "Dear —: I hear that Rhoades is claiming to have brought out that Summerfield yarn. I feel this very deeply! Just before my sainted mother breathed her last, she called me to her bedside and took me tenderly by the ear: 'Child,' said she, 'you are about to be left a half orphan, with no legacy but your spotless reputation as a liar. Cherish that vital spark of mendacity, and never let anybody get ahead of you in lying. If you don't I shall come back and kill you.' And with a long, sweet smile, she let off her soul through her nose. I've told you this before, and you know how sensitive I am. I am your benefactor, too: I used to loan you Bowman's money to get drunk on, and then hunt up Harte and get him to bail you out of the calaboose. Why do you permit 'Caxton' to snatch the laurels from my brow? Why don't you brand him as a fiend? Do you want me to set my dead mother after you? P. ### Court Chat.

— The Post says that on Wednesday, October 25th, in addition to the fog, a strong rumor prevailed in London that in consequence of the serious illness of the Queen a regency was to be established, or that at any rate the heir to the Crown was to be associated with her Majesty in the exercise of the Royal prerogative. Nay, so far did the omniscience of the seers in the dark extend, that they knew that only one difficulty presented itself, which was monetary. The Sovereign would not consent to forego a portion of the Royal income. The fog had its day, and vanishes. The rumor has been promulgated by the classic thousand tongues, and fades and disappears. The health of the Queen has been a subject of an iety and lamentation, but it is not in any sense a matter for serious alarm. The character of her Majesty is well known. So long as the power to fulfill her functions remains to her she will not abate one jot of her duties, or delegate a single responsibility of the Crown. The story therefore disappears with the annual harvest of autumnal fictions. At the same time, it is undeniable that while the public are deeply concerned about her Majesty's welfare, they are also not a little vexed at so seldom seeing the sun-shine of Royalty. They yearn for the outward appearances and trappings; they like to be spectators of hospitalities and regal entertainments. Unless this ardent desire be gratified there is reason to fear that, in the presence of the many new and revolutionary theories which are every day promulgated, men's minds may take too easily to a set of ideas which are in little harmony with the traditions of this country. It seems strange, perhaps, to set so much importance upon a lady driving round the Park, or presiding at a ball, or smiling on a huge Crystal Palace assemblage; but such is life, and upon smiles and appearance hang the love, if not the allegiance, of thousands. No one can take the place of the Queen.

— Another Burman Embassy will start for England next month. According to the Rangoon Times, "the Ku Wundouk will be dispatched to Europe with letters and suitable presents for the Queen. Three viss of gold were given out one day three or four weeks since, to make a necklace for her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. Fancy the Queen wearing an ornament weighing some nine or ten pounds on her neck. The real ambassador in the present case will be a good specimen of a really clever Burman Minister, who will be able to explain himself through an interpreter to Mr. Gladstone, or to the Queen, or to any person feeling an interest in the affairs of Burmah. The embassy will be suitably composed of men who will be no disgrace to the King or State of Burmah. His Majesty yet dreams that Pegu will be given back to him, but let him remember the language used by the late Marquis of Dalhousie, when the last embassy visited Calcutta: 'Tell your King that so long as the sun shines in the heavens, so long will the British flag float over these possessions.'"

— The Journal des Débats gives the following description of the ceremony of passing round the loving-cup at the Mansion House: "The loving-cup is a great golden vase with a cover, and filled with a mixture of champagne, claret, and spices. The Lady Mayoress turned to the left side, holding the cup with her two hands. M. Leon Say raised the cover while she drank. He then took the cup in his turn, and, turning to the left, received from his neighbor the same service while drinking. The round of the table was thus made amid the grave salutations of those passing the cup. The ancient usage wills that three persons be always standing at the same time—the one who drinks, the one who holds the cover, and the one who is to hold the cover next. It appears that the office of the third person standing is to watch over the two others that they may not be knocked on the head while they are drinking."

— The ex-Emperor Napoleon has returned to Chiselhurst from Torquay. The Western News relates the following anecdote of the ex-Emperor, who had been made exceedingly comfortable at the Imperial Hotel. A few days ago he expressed a wish to see the cook—a Frenchman—and on his entering the room, said he wanted to tell him in person how much he had been pleased with the cooking. "I have not enjoyed my dinners so much anywhere since I left the Tuileries," said Napoleon. "Sir, I am honored," was the reply; "but will your Majesty permit me to mention that I have had the honor of cooking hundreds of dinners for you and the Empress: I was cook at the Tuileries until two years ago."

— The Journal of Naples states that the Queen of Holland, on October 17th, made the ascension of Mount Veanus from Resina. Her Majesty, who was accompanied by a lady of honor, a chamberlain, and the Dutch Consul, was conveyed in a sedan chair. Professor Palmieri, director of the Meteorological Observatory, attended the Queen, and had afterwards the honor of showing her Majesty over the Mineralogical Museum.

— The Queen of the Belgians has (says Galignani) been summoned by a dress-maker to pay her bill, amounting to 67,000 frs. Her Majesty refuses to discharge it on the ground that the prices are exorbitant.

Shrunken.

We are deceived; we have been deluded; we have written lies about the land of our adoption; we feel mean; we are an impostor, a fraud; have disgraced the map of the world; our credit is shaken and our colonization schemes destroyed. We have always said and urged and written in books and emigration circulars that we had an area of 188,981 square miles to offer to the settler, whereas it is now discovered that we have only 153,000. What stupendous swindle has walked off with the odd 36,000 square miles? Have the Sierras and the Coast Range been closing in upon us, and are we like the man in the story, gradually to be crushed between two advancing walls of granite? We trow not, and only are convinced of the existence of a blunder somewhere. Henceforth we shall believe no longer in gigantic squashes, enormous beets, prodigious yields; we shall go back on our gold fields, deny our big trees, be silent about our climate, ignore the meridian of Mt. Diablo, and believe only in chaos and utter confusion of truths practical, historical or geometrical.

— The good people of San José are represented as mildly exasperated at the lateness of the hour at which the San Francisco mail arrives. Let us see: The distance from San Francisco is some seventeen miles. Fourteen miles of this must be made by steamer, and three—from San Quentin up—by rail. The steamer, with favoring wind and tide, can make her part of the distance in one hour. If there are no cows loafing on the track, the train will run up in ten minutes. Allowing five minutes for the transfer at San Quentin, we have the whole trip in an hour and a quarter. It is very evident that the mails cannot arrive any earlier (we do not know at what hour they do arrive) unless they are started off earlier. It may be objected that our explanation applies to San Rafael instead of San José. We can't keep track of all the mail routes.

— Commenting upon the case of Mrs. Sullivan, who recently rose from the dinner table and shot off the top of her brother-in-law's head to avenge an alleged familiarity, the Contra Costa Gazette says: "It is not our province, but that of the jury by whom the case will shortly be tried, to determine, upon the evidence, direct and collateral, whether or not the homicide was justifiable; and we withhold any expression of opinion or comment that might tend to influence that determination, only remarking that even human life is not so precious as womanly honor, virtue and self-respect; nor should it be more scrupulously guarded by the sword of justice." To us it appears that the sword of justice needs not be very loudly called upon to guard that which has already been very adequately protected by a shotgun.

— The following exquisite story of Anna Dickinson is upon its regular autumn tour. "While traveling West she was asleep in a car at night, with her head resting upon a ruff on the back of a seat, when a man sat down beside her and pressed her foot with his. Miss Dickinson awakened instantly, looked him full in the eye and said: 'Do that again and I will call the conductor and have you put off the train.' The man went into another car." It is a pity to spoil so excellent a tale, but candor compels us to explain that after the man had gone, Miss Dickinson was overheard to mutter "The coward!"—meaning thereby to express her contempt for a man who had not the courage to continue his advances, like a moving body, in the line of least resistance.

— We have but an indifferent respect for the man who will bore the vitals of his female with an anger, and none at all for him who drives tenpenny nails into the heads of his young. A person in one of the moral communities beyond the Rocky Mountains has been detected in the latter iniquity, and we tell him plainly that we don't like him. He will please regard this as implying that he needs expect no favors from this establishment, and may spare himself the trouble of trumping up the shallow justification common in such cases; namely, that he was putting in the nails for the children to hang their hats on. This excuse is neither newer nor better than the plea of insanity.

— O Lord, we pray thee that Thou wilt send unlimited wetness upon the thirsty earth. Grant, O Lord, that the clouds may spout water like aerial whales, and the atmosphere perspire as a fat gentleman in a street car. Vouchsafe, we pray Thee, a season of exceeding dampness, to the which end we prostrate ourselves before Thee that our humility may be rewarded with humidity. Nevertheless, O Lord, if the barometer is up, and the wind wrong, not our will but thine be done. Amen;

Great Discovery of Petroleum in the San Fernando Range. Los Angeles County.

EDITOR MAIL BAG:—Valuable springs of petroleum were discovered in 1864 by Mr. Wiley. Immediately after that discovery there was a rush of prospectors, who went upon the spot, took up a great number of claims, and formed several companies, some of which set to work and commenced boring, and sinking wells, and making tunnels, which, together with natural springs, have produced a great quantity of oil. In 1865 a large quantity of oil was sent to the San Francisco market, which realized 30 cents per gallon. A Los Angeles company established a refinery in the same year, which worked very well for several months, and the engineer was convinced that the company could get a fine quality of oil. The distance from the springs to the refining works was 35 miles, over a good road, and the petroleum was put into 40 and 60 gallon barrels. As soon as everything was in a prosperous condition, and when the company was in expectations of realizing some profit for their labor, the refining works, with all the machinery and oil which they had on hand, was burnt by a fire that occurred. This disaster caused a general panic among the shareholders in the district, and caused them, or the major part of them, to lose confidence and become downhearted. A meeting was called, and it was resolved that each claimant, in order to preserve his right, had to work three days in every month, and be furnished by the Receiver of the District with a certificate wherein it would appear that such work had been performed. This is the method that has been observed by those who at present hold their interests, and which has cost them a large amount of money. The result of their labor has been to bring the enterprise once more to life, with a more brilliant prospect than ever. The natural course of events has caused the resounding echo of the Southern Pacific Iron Horse, which is destined to fly over the narrow gauge tracks to pass over some of these rich claims, and probably this will be recorded in the course of some fifteen or twenty months, for it has already been determined by the superintendent of the surveying party that this is the only practicable pass for the railroad.

The American genius has made great discoveries during the past six years, as much for boring into the earth as for refining the oil of petroleum, or whatever other liquid substance that may be obtained therefrom, and turning the markets of the world with abundant quantities for consumption. The great monopoly of standard travel along the coast, which has been the great drawback for years to the advancement and progress of the southern counties of Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and San Diego. I will say Los Angeles, in particular, for its fine climate, for its fertile valley, for its delicious and golden fruits, as, for example, the orange, the lemon, the citron, the walnut, the almond, the olive, etc., its abundant yield of wine, brandy, whiskey, and for its extensive vineyards. To the north of the flourishing city of Los Angeles is the high and majestic range of mountains called the Tuleman Range, and contains a great quantity of minerals of all kinds. Gold was discovered in La Sociedad and Asosa by the Indians, in 1826, before General Sutter had any idea of coming into California. But, according to the tradition which we have from old residents, it is said that the Indians who first found this precious metal took samples to the priests at their respective missions and were informed by them that the place whence this metal was taken was the abode of the evil spirit, and if they were desirous of saving their souls, they must never take any of these stones, nor divulge the fact to any living person, as they were of no value whatever. These same gold mines have been worked for the space of twenty-one years, and are still being worked, especially during the rainy seasons, there having been extracted therefrom many thousands of dollars.

The ores of silver, quicksilver, platinum, zinc and tin have likewise been discovered in the above mentioned range, and at present the famous zapata silver, from which native silver has been obtained is still being worked by Dr. Winstan of Los Angeles. This wealth, which is deposited in the heart of these mountains, awaits the welcome arrival of the industrious and laboring man, aided by capitalists and those who desire to gain a fortune by enterprise and risking a limited quantity of the means which they have at their disposal.

Happy, indeed, will the time be when the brilliant sparks of fire will fly from the smokestack of the railroad engine as it passes over these luxurious valleys and through these rich mountains, carrying along with it the great treasure which has for ages been awaiting the arrival of industry and progress.

There is room for everybody who may wish to come and try their fortune. The county of Los Angeles invites all. Your most obedient servant,

V. GELICH, M. D.

— The public's most obedient servant "Veritas" is out with an amazing publication concerning the wrongs of the hyperborean Alents at the hands of the Alaska Commercial Company. Mr. "Veritas," it seems, "has long been a resident of the bottom of a well." Relying upon the well-known proverb we had supposed he resided at the bottom of a well. If we succeed in ascertaining his real name he will wish he did.

— The agent of the Rubber Clothing Co. has received a large shipment of Fire Hose, which will shortly be tested by the Fire Department. This hose is considered the best and cheapest made. It is used very extensively in Eastern cities, and long experience has fully established the fact that there is no hose equal to it. The company guarantees it to stand a pressure of 400 lbs. to the square inch.

Rosalie.

Oh! love is like the rose;
And a month it may not see,
Ere it withers where it grows—
Rosalie!

I loved thee from afar;
Oh! my heart was lift to thee,
Like a glass up to a star—
Rosalie!

Thine eye was glassed in mine
As the moon is in the sea,
And its shine was on the brine—
Rosalie!

The rose hath lost its red,
And the star is in the sea,
And the briny tear is shed—
Rosalie!

Fur Seals and Ivory.

For some months there has been published in this city an obscure sheet, half in bad English and half in excellent Kamschatkan, called (for no obvious reason) the Alaska Herald. The editor, who rejoices in the bewildering appellation of Agapius Honcharenko (and whose name we therefore suppress), with a singleness of purpose that would be creditable in a famished hen camping upon the trail of a corpulent grasshopper, has devoted his wealth of time and his want of talent solely to the hopeful industry of extorting money from the Alaska Commercial Company—whom we hereby apprise of his presence and design. His genius has not as yet been suitably rewarded, except in a few instances when he has been soundly beaten for no apparent cause other than that his existence seems to be regarded by his oversensitive countrymen as of the nature of an insult. It is probably from these repeated drubbings that has arisen a rumor that he was about to abandon the newspaper business, and prosecute the correlative one of thieving acorns from blind pigs; though, indeed, the more congenial character of that employment may have given birth to the report that he intended to turn his back upon journalism. At any rate it is untrue: he has so seldom turned his back upon anything without getting it kicked that he feels discouraged, and will probably continue to sin in the direction in which his toes are now pointed until such time as the good devil shall claim his own. Had we any influence with the latter gentleman we should beg him to postpone the evil day as long as the furnace can be kept comfortably warm without too expensive a consumption of coal; for we have it in mind to plague Mr. H. with a more exquisite misery than Mr. Satan's old-fashioned appliances are capable of inflicting. Whenever he shall be adequately toasted to a delicate brown, let us be served with an infernal writ of habeas corpus, and it will afford us pleasure to "turn him over." Lest our polite dislike to this guileless Russian Tartar should be construed as evidence that we know him, we hasten to explain that it is due solely to professional jealousy and the needs of trade. In so small a village as San Francisco, there is no room for more than one thoroughly disagreeable journal, and this niche we have always contrived to occupy with credit to ourselves and profit to the community. We have striven to be as generally disgraceful as possible, but when we contemplate the broad and varied infamy of the Alaska Herald; its minute, conscientious and elaborate mendacity; its profound and unspeakable vulgarity; its freedom from all taint of honor and all suspicion of righteousness; its unswerving iniquity, conspicuous lack of sense, and the devilish ingenuity of its methodical madness; its opulent inanity and profundity of malice—we are consumed with envy and goaded into truth!

— The elderly gentleman who has recently arrived from the cow counties, and is doggedly preparing to return, assures us with somewhat unnecessary emphasis that upon all future occasion, when he retires for the night in San Francisco, he will rigorously abstain from blowing out his gas, and will scrupulously turn it off. The elderly party is quite right. The peculiar huskiness of his voice, the pallor of his cheek, the tremor of his limbs, and the general dejection of his demeanor plead eloquently in favor of this method. We feel convinced that our friends from the country will never thoroughly enjoy tarrying in San Francisco until they shall consent to give it a trial.

— Men of uncertain temper ought not to keep double shotguns in the house. An old Wisconsiner has just illustrated the folly of this fascinating custom in a most striking manner. He took down his ancestral blunderbuss, and with one barrel of it he wrought a grievous ill upon the brain of his wife. With the other he displaced his own. Now had this weapon possessed but a single barrel, the task of reloading it would have afforded time for the gentleman's good humor to assert its sway, and society would not have incurred any loss. "The woman!" Ah! did we mention any woman? True. Well, the woman ought not to have offended her irritable friend.

— The coroner of Oakland has been unable to determine whether the body of Mr. McFadden, which was found floating in the water, was purged of its soul by accident or design. This is a question in which neither Mr. McFadden nor the community is very deeply interested. It might be a trifle more agreeable to the former to get the credit of having been assassinated, but the latter will be perfectly content with the theory that he got drunk and toppled into the damp.

— We have received the first number of a monthly publication entitled The West. It is published by "The Dial Company," and it appears that the overwhelming popularity of the former sheet (of the existence of which we have never before been made aware) has inspired this new venture. We welcome with open jaws this new nigger swimming hopefully upon the bosom of the journalistic Nile. We drink his health and him. Music—"Dear father, come home!"

— With all due deference to the Chronicle's reporter, we must affirm our entire disbelief of his statement that during an interview with Joaquin Miller the latter glued his eyes to a mirror. We believe that the necessities of his calling may impel a poet to perform a great multitude of ridiculous actions, but we do not believe that any man of genius would use glue in such a case as this, when paste would serve his turn with equal utility.

— It is strange that a man respectably connected and decently brought up should leave the path of blameless rectitude and wander in the devious and uncertain byways of crime. A gentleman of that character residing in Montana has been convicted of murdering his partner in mining. We implore that his sentence may be a light one, for this seems to have been his first offense. He had previously murdered only Chinamen.

— An Oakland person, named Nelson, fractured his ankle while wrestling with some other simpleton. If it is criminal to kill a man in a duel, is it not proportionately wicked to fracture a man's ankle in a squabble. Yes; but the former crime is so venial an offense that the latter is too trivial to take note of. If Mr. Nelson had had his back broken, his conqueror might justly have been kicked or compelled to play base ball!

— The Pacific, a religious weekly of this city, is responsible for the following bit of probably unconscious satire: "It is a rare gift to be able to tell the truth about people in such a way that they shall enjoy the reading of it." It is a gift that we do not possess: we have for some years been telling the truth about the Pacific, and the editor of that sheet does not like it at all. This is a powerful incentive to falsehood.

— Early last Tuesday morning, a muscular indigent attempted to rob a letter-carrier, and being remonstrated with upon the absurdity of such a proceeding, manifested his desperation by explaining that he would plunder the Savior if the latter were present. It is hardly likely that the latter will visit San Francisco this season, and if he did he would be crucified before this villain could get a chance at him.

— A dispatch from London informs a waiting world that "Dr. Livingstone, when last heard from, was slowly making his way toward the coast." If the tide is not against him, and he do not meet with baffling head-winds, he may be expected to arrive out about the middle of Nextember. In view of his expected advent the British Government has taken the precaution to pension his children.

— Anne Dockrell, a poor woman, was found dead in a shanty in New Brunswick, N. J., yesterday, with her head nearly eaten off by rats.—Telegram. (From the fact that none of the bodies of the rodents were discovered, it is apparent that there is at least one kind of ratsbane that has not the virtue of making these animals "come out of their holes to die.")

— An English clergyman, who was engaged in writing a history of the Popes, varied his labors by beating out the brains of his wife. Men are frequently incited to heroic actions by the contemplation of similar heroism in others. It is probable that if one were to undertake a history of the Patriarchs, he would end his researches by plausibly cheating his grandmother.

— A contemporary has been at the pains to compile several interesting accounts of kleptomaniacs, among others that of a very respectable clergyman who had an incurable weakness for stealing bibles and giving them to the poor. We can very easily credit the story of the thieving, but—well, it is at least very unusual for a clergyman to give anything to anybody.

Let Us Irrigate.

Reclamation from drought and from overflow is the first question of the day to all Californians, and men of every class in city, town and country have to-day "water" on the brain. The San Joaquin and Sacramento farmer who sowed his seed-wheat two months ago, and the great stock owner who, a month ago, had to bring his flocks and herds from their green pastures amid the heights of the Sierra Nevada down to the plains again on account of frost and snow, are watching anxiously for the rains, and they come not. The drought has perished nearly every green blade, and even the tules and the salt grasses have been eaten to their roots, and the cattle are dying everywhere in numbers, and should the rains be much longer deferred, even the city markets will only be furnished with lean meat. The impoverishment of the agricultural districts brings hard times to the cities and towns, and from day to day we can see an increasing worry and anxiety regarding the weather and its sequences filling the minds of all men. Now, we would ask, why should this state of things exist? Is it that since the American occupation of California similar seasons of severe drought have not occurred? or is it that the old residents of California have never yet been able to realize from past experience the fact that the rain-fall in these plains is precarious, and that cycles of drought have never failed in appearing every third or fourth season with more or less severity? If California, in climate, soil and natural resources, is worth but one cent of the value generally believed, then let its inhabitants be up and doing something to prevent such recurrences of drought, if prevention be possible. Are there no "Pelegs" in this land of promise who can devise and organize means for storing the undoubted rain and snow-fall in the mountains, and divide these California lands into perennial water courses and rills, so as to make the present pastures of the wilderness to spring forth, the trees to bud, and the fields to stand so thick with corn and grain that all who dwell in the country and in the city may laugh and sing and be satisfied? We read in the oldest history of the world and of man, how that Peleg, the great-grandson of Shem, was the first irrigator and the first among men after the Deluge to divide the land of Egypt and Mesopotamia into water courses. We say let some of the sons of Shem and of Japhet now in California go and do likewise.

If California had to-day a population equal to that of Europe or the far East, famine would have repeated the terrible lesson it has taught in India and in Asia generally—men would have died from sheer starvation, just as we see, all around, the cattle are dying. We believe that if the entire community would cooperate to inaugurate a general system of reclamation from drought and flood, throughout the vast plains of California, from the Tejon Pass to Red Bluffs—that within five years this entire country could be secured from these cycles of drought, and from such debacles as those of 1861-62 and 1867-68. There can be no question that the work of reclamation of lands from drought and flood, to be of any permanent and general advantage to the country, must be done in a skillful and comprehensive manner. The present system of leveeing, in which there is no continuity or any adherence to the principles of hydraulics, is an injury rather than a benefit to the country, and a waste of time and of dear capital. We believe that California, more than any other State in the Union, has paid dearly for experiments in one way and another; and what she now requires is practical skill and cheap capital to ensure success in the future. If rules and regulations regarding the construction of levees and the proper drainage to irrigated lands are not strictly enforced by the State or the public, California may become in almost a worse state than it is at present—for malignant fever and chills will prevail, as they have done this season at Bakersfield and elsewhere, consequent on the want of drainage and of properly arranged irrigation. California has good and able engineers in General Alexander, Bryan, Baker, Stangroom and others, who are competent to advise the public in these matters, and what it requires is the way to obtain cheap capital. There can be hardly any question that a complete and proper system of water conservancy and of distribution will make our Californian plains full of pleasant homesteads, smiling corn-fields, evergreen pastures, and belts of timber; but a neglect of such a system will only cause general dissatisfaction and a want of confidence in the public mind regarding reclamation. Holland, France, Germany, England, India, Egypt, and the Mississippi States, can show us clearly what to avoid and what to copy. Let the people be wise in these matters, and let the rulers of the State take council together to secure throughout the length and breadth of the land, the full blessings, and none of the evils attending the use of water for agricultural purposes.

— We note with pleasure that the Rev. Albert Williams has been divesting his soul of some exterior piety before the California Prison Commission, of which he is a member in good standing. The precise nature of the reverend gentleman's remarks we did not learn, but we presume he gave his views upon the morality of leasing city property for unholy purposes, and selling a communion service belonging to a congregation, for private emolument. The intensely wicked and besottedly secular have long accused the Rev. Albert of these practices, and inasmuch as he has never publicly denied them, it is only natural to suppose that he would take occasion to defend them. It is basely asserted by scoffers that if the Rev. Albert had his deserts he would not direct the benevolence of the Prison Commission so much as he would require it. As for us, we know nothing at all about it.

Personal Liability.

Are the editors of California the priests or the ministers of public opinion? Do they claim to be a hierarchy, holding by "divine right" the sole prerogative to dictate what the people shall believe? Is it permitted only to an editor to think or utter an opinion? Must the people cease to understand their own business, forgo their rights of petition and instruction, abandon their right to free thought and free speech, for fear of the editorial rod, ever ready to lash them into submission at the feet of a clique claiming exclusive rights to dictate to others how they shall manage their own affairs? The lawyers, merchants, and capitalists of San Francisco, after experiencing for twenty years, the delusive "protection," so-called, offered to creditors of corporations by the Constitution of the State, in the shape of personal liability of stockholders, and the disabilities imposed thereby upon the investment of capital in corporate enterprises, have, with one accord, determined to petition the Legislature to inaugurate the amendment of the Constitution by striking out the obnoxious clause. The Chamber of Commerce has taken the lead in this movement. By a committee of its ablest members, they have fully investigated the subject, and adopted a report, enumerating a dozen valid reasons why this relic of barbarism should no longer impugn the common sense of our people. One would suppose that the journalists, who live on the patronage of the members of the Chamber of Commerce, would see the propriety of ascertaining their views, and respecting their opinions on a matter peculiarly within their province, before giving vent to their own crude notions of a matter wherein they are most conceitedly ignorant, as well as supremely disinterested. In fact, it may safely be presumed that the majority of these self-constituted makers of public opinion never owned a share of stock, never held a claim against a corporation, and could not scrape together money enough to represent even a cipher on the left-hand of the millions represented by the Chamber of Commerce. But have they brains enough to see this little point? Do they remind you, gentle reader, of anything but a pack of neighborhood curs, barking at the moon as she mounts the heavens? At first all are silent, as her first rays gild the edge of the horizon. Each listens for the others. At length one gives a little yelp. No. 2, encouraged by the sound, yelps a little louder. No. 3 responds with more confidence. Another and another chimes in; until, by the time the full-orbed luminary reaches the zenith, the whole pack are convulsed with their frantic efforts to rival the light with their hideous noise. Did you ever understand why the dogs bay at the moon? It is because they fancy their barking makes the moonlight! Oh, for an editor in California that really knows something! Oh, for some printer's devil, from New York or Chicago, from the skim-milk of whose real ideas our editors could steal the material of first-class editorial butter and cheese! When the blind lead the blind, shall not both fall into the ditch? How fortunate, that our newspapers are not in demand outside the State! Else should the blood mantle the patriotic cheek at the nasty show the monkeys make who climb highest on our editorial staff!

— The celebrated Black will case has again terminated fatally in Marin County. This is the third time that the jury has failed to agree, and this tedious suit will have to be tried all over again. Several San Francisco attorneys, whose practice has made them familiar with the details of the case, have disposed of their city property, and are about to remove with their families to San Rafael. Newspapers are rigorously excluded from families up there, lest the children should read comments upon the case, and be disqualified from serving as jurors when they grow up. The prosperity of the county depends largely upon the disbursements incident to the annual trial, and a change of venue would work a financial crisis. There is but one inconvenience attending all this: every person who acquires a residence in the county becomes, by virtue of that act, either a witness or a juror, and is immediately put under heavy bonds not to leave. Even transient visitors are narrowly watched. The last jury stood eight to four, and some people—outside the county—indulge a hope of having the constitution so altered as to permit the next jury to consist of either eight or four men; hoping to thus secure unanimity. This is vigorously opposed by people inside the county, who do not desire unanimity. If the property holds out, posterity, in Marin County, will have an assured income.

— A friend in Baltimore, formerly a journalist in this city, sets down in a private letter his estimate of the people among whom his lot is cast, in the words following: "This folk is so impenetrably thick-skinned and fat-brained that it irks me. Its self-esteem is transcended only by its ignorance. Yagh-agh!—with what yawns of rage and scorn could I berate it. If I had but the time and apt occasion." It is our impression that that youth would better have a care how he shall execute any similar yawns in future, or it may chance that we shall twitter his name. A word from us and this "bright jewel from the mine" will be flung before the poking snouts of the Baltimorean pachyderma, and, faith, they'll crunch him! Better shine with pellucid modesty in an Ethiopian's ear.

— It has been discovered that the popular sentence, "In the midst of life we are in death," is not in the Bible. Then it is not true.

We're a Great Country, Sir.

The first wish of the average American is to overturn a despot; the second is to be permitted to take one by the hand. He will go to almost any length—even to the length of his ears—to assist some person to cast off the monarchical chain, and all the compensation he asks is that the person so favored shall present him at court. A king, a prince, or even a simple noble, in his own land is an object—to the American in his—of deep dislike and ridicule no end. Transport Mr. Presidentmaker to the other gentleman's country, and he becomes an enthusiastic admirer. Transport the other gentleman to America, and Mr. P. blossoms into an intense and persevering sycophant. The visit of the Russian Grand Duke illustrates the latter proposition quite as well as—as a former visit of an English Prince. We are not inclined to cavil at a decent respect shown to our very distinguished visitor; the relations of the two countries, owing to the impossibility of any rivalry between them, are of an amicable nature, and Russia did the handsome thing by Admiral Farragut and Marcus Twain. It is therefore proper that we should wreak some small sweetness upon Alexis; whom we believe to be a very worthy young man, behaving himself in seven languages. But of course any man who has mingled much in European society (we have mingled much in European society) as well as any one who knows how to deport himself at home (we know how to deport ourself at home) must experience a qualm of temperate disgust at the conduct of New York the time the Prince arrived. The unpleasant details having been so recently "flashed across the continent," it is unnecessary to here specify in what they consisted. It is enough that our representative city has not disappointed our lawful anticipations, but has made an ass of herself and us in the time-honored and characteristic way—but with a want of completeness that gives promise of more asininity to come. Had Prince Alexis come upon some important mission, or any mission at all, a part of this gorgeous pageant would have been in good taste. But inasmuch as he is a simple gentleman traveling for pleasure, and his visit to the United States, so far from having any public significance, is but an incident of his tour, the reception and welcome business is pretty much all of it snobbish and vulgar. He might have passed through any half dozen European countries and no one would have even stared at him. There is one thing that we cannot suffer to pass unnoted. That is the address of welcome that was spoken at His Royal Highness by General Shoot-him-on-the-spot Dix. We have patience for the whole speech, but room for but a single extract: "We are not so old as some European nations" [indeed!] "as our civilization dates back but one hundred years" [when we broke with Great Britain, your highness] "but among our institutions and customs you will no doubt find many things to admire" [a great many things, we flatter ourselves] "and carry back to your own country." Just so; it is no trouble to show goods. There is a fine democratic ring about this—a characteristic flavor of the republican shop—a real American aroma! It seems, however, to have been wholly lost upon the Prince, who received it in stolid silence, probably wondering what the mischief it was all about. It is probable that the young gentleman is more desirous of carrying back a few buffalo pelts, Indian curios and the like, than any institutions or customs whatsoever. Of course he is to visit California; at least if he does not he is not the man of taste and culture we take him to be. It is to be regretted that he has not as yet signified this obvious intention; but it must be remembered that nobody certainly knew that he was coming to New York until he came. Grand Dukes are apparently not ceremonious when they would a-hunting go.

— How few of our young men have a proper understanding of the duty which they owe to themselves and society.—Call. [And how few shallow moralizers have a proper understanding of the meaning of the language they use, when they talk about a man owing anything to himself. If one should say that a man was indebted to himself in the sum of one dollar and seventy-five cents, the absurdity of the statement would be apparent enough; but speak of owing duty, or respect, or some such thing, to oneself, and nine of every ten of your auditors will think you have expressed a definite idea, when in fact you have uttered only a certain number of meaningless words—and of such is the kingdom of sermonizing. In conclusion we may remark that if the duty most young men owe to themselves or others is an ad valorem duty, it may be assessed at one hundred per cent. without amounting to any very stupendous sum.

— Garibaldi is said to be greatly depressed by the political outlook in Europe. Garibaldi is now an old man, and if he permits himself to worry about trifles of that character he will certainly die. Moreover, he ought to die. Furthermore, everybody who worries about the condition of his fellow beings ought to die. These are the wretches whose meddling causes all the trouble. Our respect for the earnest souls who burn with zeal for the good of mankind—as they happen to understand it—grows marvelously less the longer we live. We yearn for a law making patriotism a felony and philanthropy a capital offense.

— It is estimated by the Lonisville press that three hundred thousand hogs will be packed in that city this year. It is estimated by outsiders that this will include a fair quantity of citizens.

California a Cotton-Producing State.

California gives bright promise of becoming a great cotton-producing State. Energetic and hopeful men have entered into the enterprise. The experience and result of their labors give them most sanguine hopes for future investments. They have practically demonstrated that cotton of an excellent quality can be raised in all our magnificent valleys, from the Sacramento to the Kern River country. The Sutter Banner, published at Yuba City, says that "Wm. Mason, on Butte slough, in this county, has cultivated the cotton plant with great success for the past two seasons. There is no question about the success of raising cotton in this valley. We look forward to the time when the Sacramento River will be planted on either side in large cotton fields. With our advantages of climate we can compete with the cotton States of the South, and allow a higher compensation for labor. Now that we have triumphed in wool-growing, and in the manufacture of woollen fabrics, let us also engage in the cotton business and hasten the day of cotton mills." The Kern County Courier (Bakersfield), in reply to the croakers who discourage the enterprise in that part of the State by saying the season in the valley is too short for the production of cotton, silences them by stating that "after a five years' experience of this climate, if any objections could be raised to the culture of cotton here, this should be the least tenable. It is to be remembered that previous to the late experiments of Major Strong, the most successful one in the State was conducted here, and that a farmer from one of the cotton States raised it successfully a number of years for his own use. This should be conclusive, but there are some facts brought under our notice the past year which establish the fact that our seasons ought to be long enough for anything. Two crops have been taken by many persons from the same ground, and we have had under our daily observation a cornfield of twenty acres, planted after the Fourth of July, which has matured a crop of not less than sixty-five bushels to the acre, the variety being the ordinary hoosier or dent corn of the Western States not remarkable, as is well known, for attaining its growth in a short period." The Stockton Independent learns that the cotton crop raised by Buckley, Strong & Co., on the land of H. F. Buckley & Bro., at Hoppton, Merced County, is turning out quite as well as was anticipated. The crop covers about sixty acres of land, which, it is believed, will yield not less than a bale to the acre. The amount already picked is about 55,000 pounds, and the second picking is not yet finished; and before the work of gathering the crop is wholly completed it will be necessary to go over the place the third time. Cotton growing is a pursuit that promises to be a great future source of wealth in the San Joaquin Valley. The San Joaquin Valley Argus adds that "some idea may be formed of the productiveness of the far-famed cotton crop of Major Strong by examination of specimen stalks and branches hanging in our office. We have a small branch of a bimb in our possession which measures fifteen inches in length and contains seventeen bolls, all but four of which are well grown. This crop of itself is of very great importance, not only because of its value to the producers, they having made a large profit upon their investment this year—but also on account of the impetus their success this season will give to the cultivation of this valuable staple hereafter. Already we hear men speak of entering into the cultivation of cotton next year upon a scale that would surprise the most extensive operators in the old cotton States, and we doubt not the acreage in this county next season, of cotton, will be computed by the thousands." It will thus be seen that a portion (patch) of this State, from Marysville in the north to Bakersfield in the south, embracing an area larger than several of the New England States, is admirably adapted to the cultivation of cotton. With the impulse already given to the production of this staple of universal use, and the continued energy of such enterprising and large-hearted men as the Stronges, Buckleys and Masons, California will soon rank among the leading cotton producing States of the Republic. The News Letter heartily congratulates California's pioneer cotton planters upon their splendid and auspicious triumphs, and anxiously awaits the development of this, at present in embryo, vast interest.

The New City Hall.

There is an evident disposition among a portion of the press to find fault with the management of the New City Hall building. Yet the closest investigation of this affair compels them to admit the ability and sagacity of the Commissioners. Their integrity has never been questioned even by their most malignant opponent. The Bulletin, in a long, well-considered article on the new edifice, which will be the glory of the city, shows that the charges about corruption and bad workmanship, made by a few disappointed, ill-conditioned architects, contractors and mechanics, are entirely baseless, and shows that no radical mistake has been made by the Commissioners, and that no radical improvement could now be suggested by anybody whose opinion is worth listening to. We believe that for the time and attention given to this stupendous undertaking, the three gentlemen appointed to superintend it, and who are directly responsible for its success, are worthy of our warmest commendation. It gives us sincere pleasure to be able to say this conscientiously. To supersede any of these Commissioners, or give the superintendence of this great work to any other body of men, no matter under what name they may go, would be to work an irreparable injury to the city, while it might oblige a few hungry politicians.

The Ghostly Maid.

Sir Gerald couched his lance in rest,
And rode to the king's behest,
Down a green glade with flowers besprent,
And ever as he onward went,
He heard a sighing voice which said,
"Ah me! oh most unhappy maid!"

Sir Gerald look'd to right and left,
He poised his lance, with action deft,
To pierce the traitor who should dare
Drive such sweet captive to despair,
And make her wail with many a sigh,
"And most unhappy maid am I!"

But though with cautious step he stole
Round yon green oak's gigantic bole,
To seize the villain unaware—
No captive and no knight were there!
He only heard among the leaves
Faint sobbing, as of one who grieves.

He thrust his shining lance between
The matted creeper's verdant screen;
He turned aside the ivy veil
Which swathed the hollow tree; the frail
And trembling willows seemed to hide
Some secret in the sluggish tide.

But look where'er he may, in vain
Are all his toil and all his pain;
Only a voice among the leaves,
And sobbing as of one who grieves,
Answer his call. "Alas! ah me!"
The plaint responds incessantly.

Since then, Sir Gerald, bravest knight
Of any in the noon-day fight,
Seems all distraught, his blunted lance
Seeks hungrily that fading chance
Of pricking in that tangled glade
The knight who grieves a captured maid.

Oh wasted lance! oh man undone!
Come out beneath the wholesome sun,
And leave the fatal lure. They say
No knight but came to rue the day
On which he followed unafraid,
The wailing of that ghostly maid! —St. Paul's Magazine.

— At a recent meeting the Academy of Sciences condensed as usual. Professor Fieldsquash took the chair, and all the rest a drink each. Dr. Schwackenheimer, of the Imperial Academy at Auesgpeilhausen, was elected an active life-member, and assigned to the duty of collecting contributions of red herrings from the poor for the advancement of science. Professor Thumbscrew read an interesting paper upon ditch-fish, and their relation to the potato rot in sheep. The Professor's impression is, that this disease is purely pathological and indigenous. It therefore is. Dr. Mudcrust presented specimens of the psora beautifully developed, and enlivened the proceedings with a scientific performance upon the Gaelic violin. A letter was received from Dr. Towne Cryer, declining to become a member of the Academy. It was stated by an insolent academist, that no one had asked him to, which was true, but unscientific. The letter was referred to the Committee on Snakes. Dr. Cobweb said that a friend of his had forwarded a nest of bald-headed hornets, which he would now open and— whereupon Dr. Cobweb was promptly knocked over with a relic of some former age. The Secretary begged to introduce the learned Dr. Spiggotwinger, of the Tierra del Fuegan Academy of Common Sense. The request was unanimously refused, and loud calls were made for some new variety of oyster. As if by magic, but really by collusion, Mr. Muckwallow pulled out one, which he said differed from all known varieties, in that it was a univalve. It turned out to be the old thing, an oyster on the half shell, and was contemptuously devoured. Dr. Doughnuteater was of opinion that more attention should be given to the study of the genesis of toads, and how they managed to avoid the pollywog state. Professor Treaclecheck thought that the pollywog condition was a sort of purgatory from which toads were exempt on account of their blameless lives. He was dragged off the stand by Prof. Pinvision, who contended that toads were really frogs, and vice versa; the popular nomenclature being one of those vulgar transpositions for which the unscientific are notorious. That disposed of the pollywog question completely and characteristically. After some desultory cracking of peanuts, it was moved that the Academy adjourn. The motion being lost, a member was sent out to see if there was anything worthy of attention in the moon. He returned in an hour, and reported that the moon was just setting. Dr. Beefnoddle wished to know if any one present had investigated the almanac; it was his opinion that the moon was at least fifteen minutes ahead of time. This proving to be the fact, it was unanimously resolved that the moon was not setting. Perceiving that it was, Dr. Leatherbelly gave notice that at the next meeting he should move a reconsideration of the vote. The reporters of the press having their note-books filled, declared the meeting adjourned till the next eclipse of Tucker's clock. At that time there will be an interesting debate upon the red corpuscles in snail-slime, and what in thunder they are doing there.

— In the southern part of this State they practice singular methods of identification. A Sheriff having offered a considerable reward for the capture, "dead or alive," of a desperado noted for the peculiar configuration of his feet, that person was duly killed, and had one of his feet cut off and sent in as proof that the usual mistake had not in this case been made. Two weeks later some persons discovered the remains of his starved wife and babe, and thoughtfully removed their scalps for the use of the Coroner.

English Capital and Californian Resources.

We welcome with real pleasure the arrival from England of the Right Honorable Edward B. Eastwick, C. B. M. P., accompanied by J. F. Dalrymple Hay, Esq., the son of Admiral Sir John Hay, M. P., and W. S. Campbell, Esq., for eighteen years a resident of Holland. We have purposely mentioned the status in society of these gentlemen, not as a matter of parade, but in order to show, when the object of their visit to California is declared, how the intellect and capital of England is directed to these shores. Mr. Eastwick represents as many millions of dollars as he may deem advisable to invest. Mr. Dalrymple Hay has the experience of travel in many lands, and Mr. Campbell has passed his life in the study and superintendence of the dykes that guard Holland. These gentlemen commenced by investigating the swamp lands of our State and have just returned from Vallejo after an exhaustive survey. We cannot say where their steps will next be directed, but we are happy of one thing, that they are in good hands. These gentlemen are not mere holiday visitors; they have come here to survey our land and all substantial interests that offer reliable security for investment, and it is earnestly to be hoped that they will not fall into the clutches of unscrupulous, designing schemers. There are sufficient solid men of business among us who have their reputation at stake as well as that of our State, whose pleasure and pride it will be to afford reliable information; for these men, independently of the natural integrity of their character, know full well that any injudicious investment, entered into with their advice or connivance, would be prejudicial to the best interests of this coast. We cannot sufficiently insist on the importance of affording all truthful information and advice to these visitors. Their success is our success; their gain is our profit, and the more inducements we can offer them by a fair exhibit of the advantages that California affords to the investment of foreign capital, the greater will be its influx. For, indeed, the great need of this State is the development of its unbounded wealth; therefore it is that we cry more! more!! more!!! of that which we so much need—namely, capital. For every million that is invested in the country, millions are returned; therefore it is that we welcome the foreign capitalists; and, whilst urging the utmost openness and candor in our dealings with them, at the same time feel an unbounded safety in the shrewdness of such men as Mr. Eastwick, who has gained experience by dint of hard thought and much knowledge of the world, and has a clear eye to distinguish between the tinsel of the many, very, very disinterested friends who will swarm around him, having all to make and nothing to lose; who are here to-day and no where to be found to-morrow, and the honest man who sees California's prosperity in her integrity. There is capital seeking investment in Europe that would flood in here were it assured of that profit which many of us know is certain. It behooves us, then, to encourage that flow by actual proof and fair-dealing; and, as we said before, the Honorable Mr. Eastwick and his friends are in good hands.

— Multitudinous and beautifully varied are the methods of accommodating a conjugal difference. Probably the most effectual is that adopted by Mr. John G. Clinton, of Lynn, Massachusetts. He first argued the points in dispute with a blunt instrument, then he enforced conviction with a can of kerosene oil, and finally soothed the resulting agitation with a lighted flambeau. A man has to pass through but one such domestic broil in a lifetime: afterward he broils elsewhere.

The question of admitting Chinamen to membership has caused a hitch in the proceedings; though we have heard of no one objecting to the admission of thieves and vagrants. There needs be no trouble about this matter: there are no Chinamen who wish to join, and no thieves and vagrants who do not.

Are Men to Fly?

An article with the above title appeared the end of last month in the London Spectator, and demands more than a passing notice from the fact of the writer's conclusions being based to a considerable extent upon the principles that were applied to the construction of our California Aviator. The article begins as follows:

"It is, indeed, a somewhat strange circumstance that hitherto so little attention should have been paid to the significant teachings of the storm. Sir John Herschel tells us that air moving in the hurricane, at the rate of ninety-two miles per hour, 'produces universal desolation, sweeping away buildings and tearing up trees.' The same force which can thus whirl the solid materials of buildings through the air is capable beyond question of supporting contrivances specially adapted for aerial navigation. But in what respect does the air in a hurricane differ from still air save in its rapid motion? And what difference can there be in the supporting power of the hurricane air and the supporting power of still air, when this latter power is called into action by rapid motion through it? The boy with the toy kite can answer this question for us; for in calm weather he can, by running, cause his kite to rise as steadily as though wind were blowing."

In the last paragraph lies the primary axiom of aviation. Let us for a moment reflect what it is that causes a kite to rise. It is the action of the air upon a plain surface, which is made resistant to, and consequently heavier than the air by a motive power, or dynamic force. This resistant force is the string, which is attached to or held by a body superior in strength to the force of the wind. A kite might be made so large that a boy could not hold it at the same time that it might require a gale of wind to make it mount. We should then have two opposing forces acting in increased ratio. The proof that the kite must be made heavier than the air by mechanical means is, that if you cut the string, the kite, released from the attached weight, falls to the ground. Now suppose that instead of a string pulling the kite forward against the air, a propelling power were placed at its back, the result would be the same, only the kite would be pushed forward and not dragged through the opposing medium. Now this last is the principle of the California Aviator, which may be summed up in two words, power and planes. The writer says, further on:

"If we can only urge aerial machines through the air at the rate of seventy or eighty miles per hour—no matter how this velocity is obtained at starting—we need not fear that either the supporting power of the air will be unequal to the task of sustaining the machine, or that there will be any insuperable difficulties in maintaining or increasing that velocity."

Here, again, the true theory is plainly laid down, force opposed to matter. Force creating weight, and that weight creating the power that rides on the wings of the storm or turns the machinery of the wind-mill. It being, however, never forgotten that sailing through the air is not like sailing on the water. In the one case we are surrounded by ether, in the other we are supported on the surface of a body denser than air. A ship floats by an involuntary action of a law of Nature; an aviator takes its course through the air by a mechanical action opposing the natural law of gravitation. Velocity alone makes the air to all intents and purposes as heavy as water.

Further on we find: "Darwin tells us that in the upper regions of the air, near the summits of the Andes, vultures may be seen floating onwards for miles upon motionless wings. What is the secret of this flotation? Gravitation acts as forcibly on the substance of the bird as on that of the animal. Nor can we believe that there is any buoyancy, properly so called, in the bird's body or wings. Those, indeed, who misunderstand the action of the gas which supports a balloon, and imagine that a sufficiently large quantity of that or some other gas compressed within the body of the bird might give this mysterious power of flotation (for the phenomenon witnessed by Darwin is undoubtedly perplexing). But it need scarcely be said that it cannot be in this way that the bird floats. The rarest hydrogen has a much greater raising power than the most compressed; and a space equal to the whole content of a bird's body, if filled with the rarest hydrogen, and near the sea level, where the air is densest, would not be equal to the support of a tithe of the bird's weight."

Once more is the plane theory forcibly illustrated. The great condor of the Andes spreads his broad wings, and with very slight modification of their angles to the line of the earth's surface, can sail on its motionless planes either with or against the wind. There is something majestic in the aerial sweep of this immense bird, the very image of the calmness of power. The idea of any gas whatever aiding this flotation is contrary to the law of aviation and to the fact, for if you make a body lighter than the air, you proportionably decrease its power of resistance, and if you shoot a condor when on the wing, he falls to the ground. The sooner the fallacy of moving a balloon against the wind is exploded, the better. Let us for one moment fancy a balloon attached to a railway train going only forty miles an hour, where would the unwieldy monster be? Flapping and beating about to get away from the current of air created by motion. Place a large platform in front of the cars, raised at a slight angle with the earth's surface, and as it rushes through the air it will nearly lift the carriage from the rails. To conquer the air, the air must be compressed under us, and that compression can only be obtained by power and planes. The writer concludes:

"The point to be chiefly noticed is the fact that a heavy body—for the vulture is no chicken, so to speak—can be sustained for long distances merely by the supporting action of the air. There can be little doubt that it is only on account of the perfect steadiness of their motion through the air that they are thus supported. The efforts of aeronautical mechanicians must be directed to secure a similar steadiness of motion for aerial machines. Granted this, there can be no reason why the powers of steam and iron should not avail to secure an aerial motion even surpassing in rapidity the flight of the swiftest birds. Unless we are willing to believe that birds fly by some power distinct from any which physical science deals with, we seem justified in believing that the bird may be matched or surpassed by the flying-machine as surely as the swiftest animals are surpassed by the locomotive."

That is just it, nor are we willing to believe that the bird flies by any power that cannot be mechanically imitated. All we want is power, but that power must be given by machinery lighter than that generally in use, and the great problem will be finally solved when the motor and the generator will be so much specifically lighter than at present, that the great weight will be that of momentum, that is, the impinging of a rapidly driven plane against a resisting current of air. It is but the boy's kite after all. Up to this time, however, the use of gas as a corrective to the attraction of gravitation has been found necessary; no driving engine of sufficient lightness having yet been constructed. The California Aviator used gas, not for the purpose of elevation, but simply to counteract gravity. This same machine, in addition, was singularly well adapted by its peculiar formation for overcoming the resistance of the air. It was cylindrical, or rather, cigar-shaped, and when fully distended, looked like a huge chrysalis. On either side of the inflated cylinder stretched the planes, forming in fact with the intervening lower part of the gas holder, one immense plane under the whole machine. We have said that gas was only used to counteract gravity, that is, the machine was inflated with sufficient pure hydrogen to rise from the ground the moment that the steam-power was exerted on its propellers. The machine was actually and necessarily a trifle heavier than the air, the instant the propellers began to revolve, it became much more so, but, then, the action of the planes came in and the Aviator gracefully breasted the empyrean. The projector of the Aviator will gradually reduce the gas-holder in proportion as he reduces the weight, and increases the power of his driving engine. Meanwhile he begs to assure the now-increasing list of believers in the accuracy, development and application of Aviator principle, he will ere long secure to California the merit of having successfully solved the problem—"Are men to fly?" with the everlasting response of "Yes!"

Gigantic Canal Cutting.

It is to be wished that the Government would stop the ship canal foolery at the Isthmus, and expend any surplus funds it may have on hand, after setting apart enough to pay the national debt, in some more useful manner. Each expedition that has been sent to survey a route has rendered it only the more apparent that there is no route. It is true, Commander Sedgwick has just demonstrated the entire feasibility of the enterprise, as most of his predecessors had done; but it may safely be predicted that within two years another expedition will be sent out to fill in the details of Mr. Sedgwick's necessarily imperfect survey, and will find that the route presents insuperable obstacles which were at first overlooked. In fact, if Mr. Sedgwick's discoveries have been correctly reported, it will hardly be necessary, except as a matter of official form, to send this supplementary expedition at all. The report that it will be necessary to cut a tunnel some miles in length, the number of miles is unimportant: one will do, and one hundred and fifty feet in height, may be regarded as "demonstrating the feasibility of that route," pretty conclusively. It is difficult in this age of magnificent engineering to define the limit of possibility in this kind of work. With the Overland Railway, the Suez Canal, and the Mont Cenis Tunnel, before his eyes, he is a bold man who shall say to the modern engineer, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." But, after all, this doubtless if there has been any notable advance in practical engineering since the dawn of history. There is not a people on earth that can duplicate the Pyramids, or furnish a parallel to the Great Wall of China; and compared with a Darien ship canal, these are but children's toy-houses. It is a maxim of engineering that with time and money anything may be accomplished, but there is a strong good sense in the human head which does, and always will, set a limit to both these factors. Men are prone to argue that a work by which posterity alone can be benefited, may justly be left for posterity to begin; and that dispose of the question so far as regard time. As for money, nearly all civilized nations are, and apparently always will be, hopelessly in debt, and need to carefully husband their immediate resources to prosecute wars by which to increase the balance against them. It is not impossible that there will some day be a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, but if any gentleman now living desires to sail through it, he would better put himself into hygienic training in order to insure a very ripe old age.

—The Pacific Coastors in Congress will move an investigation of Indian affairs, in order to ascertain if Mr. Colver's peace policy has proved successful. It has; eminently so. Under it the Indians have exhibited a meekness and tractability unparelleled. It is now almost impossible to distinguish an Apache from a peaceful White. About the only difference is that the latter has no scalp and the former has two.

A Birthday.

Another year has passed away—so soon!
 For soon it seems, although my calm life keeps
 The sameness of a shadow-line that creeps
 Down a blank wall from early morn to noon.
 I still am waiting vainly to be taught,
 By some dream realized, how much more keen
 Is real joy than that which is but seen
 In visions fashioned by too idle thought.
 Still, sadly wishful, every year I build
 Some scheme by which, before the next is gone,
 An eager crowd of hopes may be fulfilled.
 Shall I in very fact ever ascend
 The dreamed-of heaven or half content pass on Until some silent day shall bring the end? —Cham. Journal.

European Pyrotechnics.

FUN'S SHORTHAND NOTES.—Dialectical Society's report on Spiritualism leaves the question just where it was. Just what we expected! The combined braying of all the donkeys since creation would never throw any light on the conjuring of Hermann. —Potato disease has appeared in the West of England as well as in Ireland. We fear it is a rooted evil. —Great excitement in Spain about the Sagasta manifesto. Pity they don't manifest more sagas'tly. —Bradlaugh, "interviewed" by Yankee, implied that "Gladstone and I" ruled the country. Evidently thinks himself some pippins—"how we apples swim!" —Metropolitan Railway prosecutes and persecutes smokers. Well, we would rather inhale the fumes of the worst tobacco than have a whiff of the natural atmosphere of the line.

—MUCH HE NOSE ABOUT IT.—The other day a youth, who had just entered a mining office as clerk, was observed to be holding a specimen of tin ore to his nose, and sniffing at it with perseverance and vigor. Being asked by his employer what he was engaged in doing, he said that he had heard frequently that Cornish and Welsh people smelt ore, and that as they made money at it, he thought he would have a try too!

—The musical critic of an American paper says: "Then silence came like a poultice to heal the bruises of sound." The presentation of a diamond ring to a Cincinnati actress, the other day, gave a gifted reporter of that city the opportunity for this remarkable outburst: "It was a trifling tribute from an humble admirer of the noble drama to a brilliant beacon upon the shot-tower of histrionic genius."

—The following epigram was made by a distinguished English scholar at the opening of the Mont Cenis Tunnel:

"Woe to Italia! that a way hath through
 The caverned Alp to what is hollow too.
 For hollow France will first rush out to sack,
 And gorged will be the last to hasten back.
 Thiers through one hole spies and ogles Pope,
 Whose glance at t'other hole fills him with hope.
 Quick! stop the holes; Italia, for the gaze
 Of such weird eyes may see thee end thy days."

—A Yankee in England being annoyed by the constant boasting as to the superiority of the English girls, finally silenced laudation by declaring that "they had a gal in Boston only eleven years old who could chew gum in seven different languages with her eyes shut."

—A COINCIDENTAL COGNOMEN.—Singleton Civilian, Esq., of H. M. Stationary Department—"Now, boy, out of the way." Boy—"Yer! who a you a-shoving-of? Yer thinks yerself somebody, I suppose—yer—yer stick o' salary!"

—DICKERY, DICKERY, DOC.—We have become accustomed to see "No cards" at the end of the announcements of marriages; but the novelty and originality of this notice of a birth in the Standard last week are remarkable:

Sept. 3d, at Windsor, the wife of William Talley, Esq., Solicitor, of a daughter. No doctors.

We trust in the interest of the medical profession this practice will not extend to the column of "Deaths." It would look queer for the physicians to see: "On the —th instant, at —, —, Esq., after a short illness. Six doctors!"

—A WEIGHTY ARGUMENT.—Lean Passenger.—"H'm! Pity they don't charge by weight in these 'buses." Stout ditto.—"Think so? Why, if they did, they'd never stop to pick you up!"

—A Home Rule Club is about to be started in Dublin. The Irish rule must be thirteen inches to the foot, and England and Scotland be satisfied with twelve.

—It is pleasant to observe that Charles Commerfield, has been assailing and battering that legal fiction, John Doe. Mr. Commerfield's victory may be regarded as a triumph of the real over the ideal.

Special Brevities.

— The Prussian War Department has given orders for enlarging the Small-arms Factories at Spandau, Erfurt, Dantzig, Sommerda, and Suhl, so as to enable them to manufacture 100,000 rifles a year instead of 30,000 as hitherto. What the future German rifle is to be is not yet settled, but it is believed that a decision on this point will be arrived at very soon. If the Werder rifle is selected, the Bavarian Government Factory at Amberg, which has lately been enlarged, and can turn out from 30,000 to 40,000 rifles a year, will also be set at work with the Prussian factories. It is also proposed, in order to hasten the arming of the German troops with the new rifle, to make contracts with private manufacturers both for entire rifles and parts of rifles. The side-arms for the North German Army have hitherto been provided almost exclusively from the factory at Solingen, but now that the celebrated factories of Klingenthal, in Alsace, have passed into the possession of Germany, they will be used for the production of these arms for the German troops. It is not proposed to establish any Government manufactory for cartridges, although one has been introduced on a limited scale in Bavaria, as it is thought that the necessary quantity may always be supplied by private manufacturers.

— There is a very good story of the origin of the custom of charging for the insertion of marriage announcements. At first these were published freely, as they still are by many provincial papers. But in the early days of the Times it was the custom in announcing a marriage to state the amount of the bride's dowry—£20,000 or £30,000, whatever it might happen to be, and in looking through the ladies' column one morning at breakfast, Mr. Walter threw out the suggestion that if a man married all that money he might certainly pay a trifling percentage upon it to the printer for acquainting the world with the fact. "These marriage fees would form a nice little pocket money for me, my dear," added Mrs. Walter, and as a joke her husband agreed to try the experiment. The charge at first was but a trifle, and the annual amount probably not much; but Mrs. Walter, at her death, passed this prescriptive right of hers to her daughter, and when a few years ago the right was re-purchased by the present proprietor it was assessed at £4,000 or £5,000 a year.

— The Malta Times says: "While people are talking of a railroad to India direct, to accomplish the passage from London to Calcutta in five days, the Viceroy of Egypt has actually commenced one of the most gigantic undertakings ever attempted in his territory—that of connecting Upper and Lower Egypt by rail. At the terminal point of all ancient and modern conquest, where the mighty Persian and Roman invaders found the desert an impassable barrier, the Khedive, assisted by an army of English engineers and navvies, will, unless stopped by the jealousy of the Sultan, drive an iron road and a team of iron horses, not only to the very confines of Nubia, but into the heart of Africa, opening up new fields for commerce, and perhaps bringing Livingstone home first class. When it is considered that the line, commencing at the Second Cataract, is to be six hundred miles long, some idea may be formed of the amount of labor required to complete the work."

— A brave-hearted woman saved the lives of an American family recently by an act of heroic self-devotion. On the road from Ramsgate to Broadstairs a wagonette belonging to our countryman, Major Eccles, was quietly pursuing its way, when a portion of the harness got loose, and the coachman descended from his seat to set it right. He had scarcely touched the ground, when the horses took fright and set off at a furious pace. They were met by a Miss Howard, of London, who happened to be walking in the direction of the North Foreland. Without a moment's thought she rushed forward, seized the reins, and was dragged along the road a considerable distance, but she had the satisfaction of turning the horses' heads, and thus preventing the whole party being dashed over the cliff. We are sorry to say that Miss Howard has received several severe contusions, which will confine her to her bed for some time. There are many of her sex who will envy her her injuries.

— Some very remarkable concretions of chalcodony have been recently discovered in Brazil, by H. Rosenbusch. In the valley of the Jahu, a tributary of the Tiète, in a bed of marl, he observed long cylindrical tubes, which on extraction he found to be chalcodony. They are some of them 2 inches long by  $\frac{1}{4}$  inch in thickness, are for the most part well rounded and hollow; the interior being coated with red ochre, containing much organic matter. Some of the flattened tubes are clearly formed by the junction of smaller ones. The tubes when found were coated on the outside with quartz crystals, these were in turn covered with a layer of chalcodony, and outside this, in contact with the marl, was another layer of quartz. It is scarcely to be doubted that these remarkable formations have an organic origin, being exceedingly similar in general structure to the indusial limestone of Auvergne.

— The King of Burmah is a lucky monarch. He possesses a family of missing links, hairy human subjects with the oe coccygis unusually developed. The mother is 45 years of age, her son 20, and her daughter 11; and all three are covered in every part of their body, faces included, with hair varying in length from three inches to a foot, and exactly the color and texture of that on a Skye terrier. The King, it is said, sets great store by the monstrosities, and thinks the King of Siam's white elephants are very poor in comparison. The King of Siam, on the other hand, pooh-poohs the shaggy family.

— The Athenæum records the discovery of what it describes as the largest diamond yet found in the South African diamond fields. In July last two adventurers are said to have discovered, on the first day of working their claim, a diamond weighing 124 carats.

— There was a meeting of Ultramontane cardinals at the Vatican, when it was decided that in the event of the Pope's death they would proceed to the choice of his successor without taking notice of the other party in the Sacred College. I hear in the best informed circles that the successor they have selected is Cardinal Capalti, Cardinal Patrizi having already refused the tiara. If Cardinal Capalti should be elected, there is no chance of his transgressing so far as to make any conciliatory advances to Italy.

— The Army and Navy Gazette, London, hears that officers have sent in their papers "by hundreds and hundreds." In one cavalry regiment one major and six captains and several subalterns seek to retire. The Dublin Brigade Office is reported to have had 400 applications to retire, and we are afraid to mention the number reported to have been received at headquarters. There is, indeed, "an ugly rush" to get out of the army.

— The French journals publish a curious statement, said to have been prepared from authentic statistics, showing that during a year's occupation of Champagne, the German army of occupation consumed no less than $2,550,000 bottles of the famous vintage of that country. Of that quantity Rheims supplied 1,884,000 bottles, Epernay 483,000, and Aï 272,200.

— The Yale College exploring party, under Professor Marsh, has arrived at Portland, Oregon, from eastern Oregon, where they have spent the last six weeks in geological investigations in the Blue mountains and John Day valley. Interesting discoveries were made, including many new species of extinct tropical animals of the tertiary period.

— The Japanese Government has issued a decree wiping out the position of Daimios. This reduces people who have been rulers for over three hundred years to the position of the common people, and immediately annexes their territories to the Government. There is no longer any aristocracy or religion except through the Mikado.

— The Commune refugees in London have started a paper called the Qui Vive. It declares the conversion of the English working men to Internationalism to be hopeless.

— Mr. Parker Gillmore (known to sporting readers as "Ubique") has in the press two volumes on "Prairie Farms, and Prairie Folk."

— The remarkable article on "Spiritualism and its Recent Converts," in the Quarterly Review, is from the pen of Dr. W. B. Carpenter.

— For the foundation of the new City Hall there are required some six thousand tons of broken stone—"egg size." The contractor is furnishing the article precisely as specified; but it pains us to observe that he construes the stipulation as requiring him to furnish stones of the size of a roc's egg. The gentleman is too careful a student of the Arabian Nights to make a good contractor.

— A lot of clerical incurables at Petaluma have passed a resolution pledging themselves to discourage wine growing in the district afflicted by their presence. It is quite unnecessary to take any active measures for this purpose: their existence is sufficient to produce discouragement in a general way; and the aspect of their vinegar visages will prevent the grapes from ripening.

— The complaint against one George W. Tyler, who so misbehaved himself in the Police Court as to cause a hasty adjournment, was dismissed. Justice seems to be sufficiently sharp-sighted concerning what occurs in the byways of the Barbary Coast, but she is blind indeed to what is done under her nose. But she might have smelled Mr. Tyler.

— An advertisement in the dailies reads idiotically thus: "O, knock me down, Across the Continent!—California Theater." If this extraordinary request is made by Mr. Oliver Dowd Byron, "the juvenile star," we should be most happy to comply, as nearly as possible, by knocking him down, and kicking him across the continent.

— No man ever achieved greatness who was not industrious and persevering in some honorable pursuit.—Call. [Nonsense; a man may become a great idler without either; and perseverance alone will make a great dunce. The editor of the Call is a bright and shining proof.

— The blood-stained bedding upon which President Lincoln expired is offered to the Government at a reasonable rate. It is to be hoped the Government may decline to purchase; Congress has neglected to make any appropriation for laundry expenses.

Ford, the Fireman,

Who saved Six Lives, and Lost His Own, at a Fire in the Gray's Inn-road, on Saturday, the 7th of October, 1871.

Why glints the autumn sun on glittering helms?
Why the Dead March with its funeral beat?
Why this vast crowd, whose silence overwhelms
The roaring of the street?
The marching column has a martial air;
Its tramp is timed like tread of well-trained troop;
Is it some famous Captain that they bear
To where the dark yews droop?
A common man!—a fireman!—what, no more?
Why tears? Why sobs? Why grief on every face,
As though it were some hero that ye bore
To his last resting place!
Not always, true, are purest laurels won
Amid red carnage in fierce battle's strife,
But earned by humble duty, bravely done,
In saving human life!
This was a hero! Yet he never strove
To win distinction for his simple name.
His way through flame and stifling smoke he clove
For duty—not for fame!
With single purpose acted he his part,
Conscious of living in his Maker's ken;
And well the lesson had he learnt by heart
Of Him, who died for men.
'Twas so he died! From out a fiery grave
He snatched the helpless, weak with wild despair,
Then in his wonted work's performance, gave—
Freely—his life for theirs!
Before that plain deal coffin, bow the head!
That land's secure which may such heroes boast;
Write Joseph Ford among the honored dead,
Whom England prizes most!

—Fun.

Court Chat.

— There is a pleasant story told of M. Casimir Périer when he was a diplomatist and Louis Philippe was King. Just before the new year the Austrian Ambassador, who was to have complimented the citizen king, was recalled, and the task devolved on the Russian Ambassador as senior representative. When the Emperor Nicholas, who never could tolerate the younger branch of the Bourbons, learned this, he ordered Count Palen to repair to Moscow for instructions. As there was nothing stirring in Europe at the time, the affront was unmistakable; and M. Guizot determined to revenge himself. His first idea was to recall the French Ambassador, but unfortunately M. de Barante was on leave of absence at the moment, and could have only been recalled from Auvergne. M. Casimir Périer was First Secretary at St. Petersburg, and M. Guizot sent him a violent dispatch, insisting on the necessity of upholding the honor of France, and instructing him to catch a violent cold in the head, and to refrain from attending any Court festivity. M. Casimir Périer obeyed, and, as the chronicler remarks, his pocket handkerchief became le drapeau de la France. For two months the unfortunate First Secretary was confined to his room, not daring to show his nose outside the Embassy till he received permission from his Government. During his confinement he was constantly receiving dispatches on the necessity of maintaining the honor of the flag, and making the Czar feel that France was not to be insulted with impunity.

— Bismarck is resolved to let Benedetti go the full length of his tether. The latter was evidently ignorant of the source from whence the Chancellor obtained the grounds of accusation against him. By a turn of that singular good luck which has hitherto followed the Prussian statesman all through his career, the papers proving the truth of his assertions, containing the whole report, in short, of the affair of Luxembourg and the annexation of Belgium, were found by a curious chance at M. Rouher's chateau at Cerçay. After the first wholesale search had been made by the Prussian soldiers, the commander sat himself down at Rouher's own bureau to write a dispatch to headquarters. The chair was high, the commander short and puffy; he asked for something to raise his feet, and one of the men dragged from beneath the bureau a flat wooden box, which was made to answer the purpose required. The box had a suspicious appearance to a diplomatic eye; it was forced open, and sure enough its contents were found to be of the highest importance. Needless to say the commander immediately sat down again to write another dispatch to headquarters, this time without the aid of the box to rest his feet upon. He already felt taller by many inches after the discovery.

— Gordon, the Scottish painter, used to tell this story of Lord Palmerston: "I had exhibited for several years, but without any particular success. One year, however—the year before I painted 'The Corsicans'—Lord Palmerston took a sudden fancy to my picture, called 'Summer in the Lowlands,' and bought it at a high figure. His lordship at the same time made inquiries after the artist, and invited me to call upon him. I waited upon his lordship accordingly. He complimented me upon the picture; but there was one thing about it he could not understand. 'What is that, my Lord?' I asked. 'That there should be such long grass in a field where there are so many sheep,' said his lordship, promptly, and with a merry twinkle of the eye. It was a decided hit, this; and, having bought the picture and paid for it, he was entitled to his joke. 'How do you account for it?' he went on, smiling, and looking first at the picture and then at me. 'These sheep, my Lord,' I replied, 'were only turned into that field the night before I finished the picture.' His lordship laughed heartily, and said, 'Bravo,' at my reply, and gave me a commission for two more pictures, and I have cashed since then some very notable checks of his, dear old boy!"

— The Daily News says that the discourses about the peers and the working men serve, if for nothing else, to prove that there is a new-fashioned Toryism which is very like old-fashioned Radicalism. This new Toryism, wherof Mr. Disraeli is the natural representative, has a full flavor of Socialism, and a clearly perceptible soupçon of Rousseau. But how is this to get along with the old-fashioned article which is still in existence, and never perhaps showed a stronger and finer quality? Ludicrous as the new social alliance may have proved itself, yet it probably threw a light on one of the imminent contingencies of the future. It has made it clear that there are Conservative peers and leaders—probably Mr. Disraeli is among the latter—who would readily listen to any plausible scheme for securing the alliance of a section of the working men. The News fails to see how the Tories with ideas and the Tories with convictions are to continue to hold together under the influence of such powerful solvents as these. It seems to be very much distressed about Tory affairs, and vexed at the union of aristocrats and workmen.

— Once on a time, Lord Russell (whom then we used to call Lord John) called a cab in the evening to carry him from the House of Commons to Chesham Place. To the cabman he gave a coin; but when, with proper care, he balanced his accounts at night, he found nineteen shillings short. He rightly concluded that he had given his driver a sovereign for a shilling. On the following day he asked the waterman in Palace Yard whether he remembered the cabman. The cabman was found; Lord John reminded him of what had occurred. The cabman knew all about it, and acknowledged his rascality. Lord John suggested the immediate return of the money. "Can't be done, your Lordship," says the cabman, grinning. "Can't! why not?" rejoins the immortal Whig. "Why, my Lord, I thought a great nobleman like you of course meant to give me the money as compensation for the honor of driving you. So, as my boots were blessed old, I went and bought a pair, and here they are," pointing to his somewhat shapely legs. "They're very nice boots, my Lord. Some calls 'em Wellingtons; I calls 'em Russells."

— The long-disputed question of the "works of art" sent over to New York by the astute manager of some lead works in the South of England, is at length decided in favor of the "arts," to the great amusement of the public. The long and melancholy array of tall thin leaden statues, all with hanging nether lips and trumpet noses, has disappeared from the Custom House wharf, where they were landed last August. The story of these statues is curious. The duty on lead is heavy—works of art are admitted duty free—so the lead works in question, by causing their consignment to be melted down into statues of Lord Brougham, escaped the duty. Four and twenty Lord Broughams have been standing all this while in a gloomy line awaiting the decision which should pronounce them works of art or blocks of metal. The excitement has been so great that when the law had decided in favor of their "artistic origin," many of them were sold at a high price as curiosities and mementoes of the strange dilemma into which the lawyers had been thrown by the cunning of the Britishers.

— The rumor of the determination on the part of the Emperor Francis Joseph to abdicate is gaining ground in all the European chancelleries, where the subject is openly discussed. It is said that the Emperor draws back dismayed at the difficulties which lie in his path, and acknowledges himself incapable of grappling with them. The terrible stab received in the neck some years ago has always grown troublesome in its effects toward the autumn season, and this year His Majesty's nerves are so much shattered by the political anxieties which beset him, that it is said the doctors advise absolute retirement from public affairs. The old Palace at Buda is already fixed upon as his retreat.

— Germany has not become drunk with her victories, or if there be drunkenness, it arises from lager beer. That is the drink preferred even by Prince Bismarck himself. At his soirees, which are now to be resumed, little casks of lager beer from Vienna are never missing. They are brought in after the champagne, and the beer is drawn from the tap as soon as the ladies have left, or even before. The Prince has only publicly sanctioned what was a habit privately indulged in by gentlemen before.

— The hearing of the Tichborne case will commence on the 7th of November. The claimant of the Tichborne baronetcy and estates is in the West of England. At Plymouth he visited an equestrian performance, which is conducted by an old friend of his. He is now staying with a friend in Cornwall. It is alleged by his adherents that the first person he will put into the witness-box, on the resumption of the trial, will be Arthur Orton.

A Mexican-American Steamship Enterprise.

The Mexican Government has granted a steamship contract to one of its prominent citizens, Don E. N. Zerman, formerly an officer in the Mexican naval service. The contract specifies that two lines are to be established, one running along the entire Mexican coast from Ventosa, Tehuantepec, to Guymas, Sonora, and a connecting line between Mazatlan and San Francisco, the latter to make twenty-day trips. Both lines are to be free from all duties in Mexican waters, and in addition to these exemptions the coast line receives a subsidy of $72,000 per year. The vessels are to be of substantial build, 500 tons burden, and must fly the Mexican flag. This reads well on paper, but will not work in practice. There is no regular trade between Ventosa and Guymas, and no material out of which to create it. The insignificant commerce of the entire Mexican Pacific Coast is done by a few small schooners. An attempt was made some two years ago, by Messrs. Holladay and Brehm, to establish a permanent steamship line between Mazatlan and Acapulco, but the enterprise had to be abandoned after great loss. The forty-day line of the North Pacific Transportation Company, now running between this city, Mazatlan and other Mexican ports on the Gulf of California, barely pays expenses, and could not exist if owned by a less powerful company. It is not at all probable, then, that the new twenty-day line could meet with the shadow of success. As to the subsidy and the freedom from port charges in the Mexican waters, it is not likely that the subsidy will be paid, and the duties would certainly be collected whenever the State Governments found their finances depleted. The greatest danger threatening this proposed enterprise is the revolutionary spirit which, like a volcano, has its periodical eruptions at all important points where the line would touch. The first revolutionary chief who could would seize or destroy the steamships of the Company, knowing that they were substantially the property of the general Government. But notwithstanding all these obstacles, the spirit of this proposed Mexican-American Steamship Company illustrates the fact that the Mexican Government and people are ambitious and far-seeing enough to grasp at a project which, however dubious to-day, must in the future become one of the most important commercial enterprises on this continent.

Notice to Mariners.--U. S. of America, California.

LIGHTHOUSE at TRINIDAD HEAD, CALIFORNIA. Notice is hereby given, that a revolving red light, of the 4th order, of the system of Fresnel, will be exhibited for the first time on the evening of December 1, 1871, and on every evening thereafter, from sunset to sunrise, from the tower recently erected on the southern slope of Trinidad Head. The illuminating apparatus is so arranged as to produce a red flash of 5 seconds duration, a partial eclipse of 5 seconds, a total eclipse of 45 seconds, and a partial eclipse of 5 seconds: the time from one red flash to the next one being 1 minute. The tower is of brick, painted white, except the dome and railing, which are red. It is 18 feet from base to focal plane. The light is elevated 198 feet above mean sea level, illuminating an arc of 360 deg. of the horizon, and should be seen in a clear state of the atmosphere from the deck of a vessel 15 feet above the water, at the distance of 20½ nautical miles. The keeper's dwelling is a two-story wooden building, painted white. It has a brick foundation. The building is situated about fifty yards to the N.E. of the tower, and about on the same level with it. The usual out-houses are to the rear of the dwelling. The geographical position of the lighthouse, as shown by the Coast Survey Chart, is latitude 41 deg. 03 min. 07 sec. North, longitude 124 deg. 08 min. 21 sec. West. The magnetic variation is 17 deg. 38 min. East. From this light the following are the magnetic bearings to the headlands to the northward and southward: To Cape Blanco lighthouse, N. N. W. ¾ W., distant 106 miles; to Crescent City lighthouse, N. by W. ¾ W., distant 42 miles; to Humboldt lighthouse, S. ¾ E., distant 17 miles; to Cape Mendocino lighthouse, S. ½ E., distant 39 miles. The angle of visibility over the water is 214 deg. 30 min., being from N. W. by W. to E. N. E. ¾ E. By order of the Lighthouse Board:

JOSEPH HENRY, Chairman Lighthouse Board.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Office Lighthouse Board, Washington, D. C., November 2, 1871.

— Mr. Honcharenko, of the Alaska Herald, is of opinion that the Russian Government is trying to assassinate him. We do not know why the Czar should seek to crack this louse upon another man's head.

— A New York farmer killed himself by lifting a barrel of potatoes.—Exchange. (Many a man has killed himself by lifting a jug of whisky. Why publish incidents without any moral insignificance.

— It is stated as an evidence of advancing civilization among the Indians that wives among them are no longer sold; they are given away. Civilization, it would seem, has a tendency to make women worthless.

Weariness.

O little feet that such long years      O little hands! that, weak or strong,
Must wander on through doubts and fears      Have still to serve or rule so long,
Must ache and bleed beneath your load!      Have still so long to give or ask!
I, nearer to the way-side inn,      I, who so much with book and pen,
Where toil shall cease and rest begin,      Have toiled among my fellow men,
Am weary, thinking of your road.      Am weary, thinking of your task.

O little hearts! that throb and beat,
With such impatient, feverish heat,
Such limitless and strong desires!
Mine that so long has glowed and burned,
With passions into ashes turned,
Now covers and conceals its fires.

—Longfellow.

Leaves from a Lady's Diary.

Nov. 18.—Went to Vallejo. The trip there along the Bay is delicious, but I hate small provincial towns. There is an affectation of the great city about them, and a would-be gentility that is the more vulgar on account of the utter want of necessity for the disguise. Cities like San Francisco or New York have their silly, vain people, but they are unheeded in the crowd. The towns that I avoid are those containing ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, with a Mayor, Town Council and two newspapers, whose editors spend their time in vilifying one another. These pigmy cities sit like so many Jeremiahs by the shores of the Bay, prophesying the fall of Babylon. The natives are to be seen between nine and ten in the morning swarming up from the neighborhood of Broadway Wharf, and arriving from Napa and Petaluma and the various townlets in Sonoma Valley. The men look uncomfortable and the women indulge in strange colors. They strew themselves along Montgomery and Kearny streets, and rejoice in the White House and Bradley & Rulifsons.

Nov. 19.—Had to stay here till to-morrow, Sunday too, when one could not go out. Bought Charles Reade's "Terrible Temptation," and quite agree with the critics. It is unpleasantly immoral. The French writers manage these things better. There is a charm in their most improper books, in the same way that there is an elegance in their amours. If an Englishman has an intrigue with a woman, he is sure to compromise her by some gross act or other, however well-bred he may be, whereas a Frenchman sins so gracefully, at the same time without any lack of ardor, that although one may be offended, one is never disgusted. It is the same with this book of Reade's. He has aimed to be French, and has become broken English. He enters into details that are dirty without being sensuous, and describes scenes that are grossly horrible and not exciting. The book will be read on account of the abuse it has had.

Nov. 21.—Got home last night. Was tired this morning. So spent the day arranging a secretaire full of papers. Nothing is so attractive, and passes away the time more quickly, than looking over old letters and scraps. One lingers over some and ponders over the meaning of another, until it brings up a crowd of lost memories, and then one comes to a bit of one's own composition, and it reads better than we thought it did when we put it aside, and one dwells longer on one's own writings than on those of others; just in the same way that I have seen both men and women rest with a fond, searching gaze on their own photograph in an album, especially if they think that no one is looking.

Nov. 22.—Henry has bought tickets for the Bianchi Opera season. I am so glad I never intended to ask him, although Lucy was always teasing me about it. Jessie's husband won't let her have them, and in truth, I am not sorry, for she always puts on so many airs. Henry won't want to go every night, and I can choose my cavalier, H., for example. Quien sabe?

The Russian Wheat Crop.

A press correspondent says of the harvest in Russia, under date of St. Petersburg, October 2d: Russia has a small wheat crop. It is counted that there is not more than half the usual yield; but the quality of wheat we have is excellent. For twenty years the grain has not been so fine. At St. Petersburg the price will not be less than one ruble and seventy kopecks per pud (forty pounds), and this at present exchange would make the price about 5s. 4d. sterling for forty pounds, landed in western Europe—a price at which no shipments can take place unless scarcity greatly raises the price in that direction. For the price I give at St. Petersburg a large part is to be counted as paying the transportation to that point. Wheat, of course, is much cheaper where it is harvested, and this is to be kept in mind as a circumstance likely to favorably affect the price of what goes by the Black Sea. But against this again comes the fact that in those districts have been the greatest losses. In several provinces on the Volga the crops were altogether killed by a dry summer, while in one of them, Saratov, a quite unexpected frost, which occurred late in May, did a great deal of harm. In some parts of Kostroma and Nijni Novgorod, there is an average crop, but these are exceptions. In Orenburg and the neighboring Kirghiz steppes the prospects were good in the early part of the year, but were spoiled by the drought of June and July. In some of the

How dear does mother hold Her bonny little one!	How fair does mother think The darling at her breast?
Just as dear as the jostling clovers Hold the merry sun.	Just as fair as the fleet white sea-bird Thinks the wave's white crest.
How hard would mother try To please her pretty lass?	How long will mother's love For her treasure last?
Just as hard as the pleasant showers Try to please the grass.	Just as long as her heart keeps beating— Till her life be passed.
How much will mother's love Change from warm to cold?
Just as much as the mountain changes, Or the ocean old!

Religious.*MR. VOYSEY'S FIRST SERVICE.

"A Stray Sheep" in the Pall Mall Gazette, giving an account of Mr. Voysey's first service, says: "I have for some time been anxious to discover a preacher who should satisfy my notions of what preaching ought to be. I am not particular as to the creed; the Dissenting minister or the Catholic priest would be almost equally welcome. But I dislike humbug, and I abhor twaddle. These two elements enter so largely—by some strange infelicity in my geographical position—into the sermons delivered from neighboring pulpits, that I have decided to go further afield. I can listen with pleasure to anybody who speaks like an honest man, who has some moderate faculty of utterance, and who is not too great a fool." * * * Mr. Voysey spoke out like a man. He is no great orator, but he affords the rare and pleasant spectacle of one who has really something to say which he believes to be of the last importance, and which he says without reservation or equivocation. Indeed, his plain speaking makes one regret the strange subterfuges to which so obviously a sincere man had recourse in order to retain his ministry in a Church whose doctrines he denounces. A "pure Theist" insisting upon his right to use the Athanasian Creed seems just a little out of place. In St. George's Hall Mr. Voysey could denounce "popular Christianity" (the epithet seemed scarcely necessary) to his heart's content. He denounced the doctrine of the fall of man, which implied that the primeval man was perfect instead of being in "the lowest rank of savages," or, as he might have said, a monkey. He denounced the whole doctrine of the atonement—the belief, on his interpretation, that God had damned countless millions of the human race for no fault of their own, and pardoned a few in consideration of the punishment of an innocent sufferer. He denounced as "only less noxious" than these cardinal errors so long a list of doctrines that one asked half nervously where he was to stop. A single sentence was enough to abolish the devil, eternal damnation, the doctrines of the Trinity and the Divinity of Christ, the Sacraments, the spiritual authority of the Church, and sacerdotalism in every shape and form. The destruction of these superstitions is to be the work of Mr. Voysey and those who agree with him, and especially the destruction of the belief that erroneous opinion can be a cause for eternal punishment. That cowardly doctrine, so he held, was the chief cause of the bondage of modern Englishmen; but he looked forward to its being swept away even in this generation.

A FOREIGNER ON ENGLISH RELIGION.

M. Taine, in his "Notes on England," gives a very fair picture of our field preachers, whom he characterises as "private persons who experience a want of communicating their religious ideas to the public." He approves their exertions on the following grounds: 1st. They give vent to a strong passion, an intense conviction which, if deprived of an outlet, would turn to madness, melancholy or sedition. 2d. They are moral, and may take a good effect upon some consciences. 3d. They keep fresh in the minds of the general public the persuasion that there are august ideas, serious beliefs, sincerely zealous souls. The average Englishman is, according to M. Taine, essentially religious. He believes in God, in the Trinity, in hell, though without fervor. The Protestant dogma accommodates itself very well to the serious, poetical and moral instincts of the race. No effort is required on their part to keep it; an effort would be needed to reject it. An Englishman would be very sorry not to believe in another life; it is, in his eyes, the natural complement of this; in all great crises his thoughts become solemn and lead him to the vistas of that which lies beyond. He owes a grudge to the troublesome persons who would unsettle the opinions he has formed on the subject. They are formed, fixed, rooted; they are a part of his education, of his traditions, of the great public establishment to which he belongs. He accepts Protestantism and the Church in a lump with the English Constitution. He sees in Protestantism a rule of conduct, an exhortation to righteousness, an appeal to inward self-government. He sees in the Church an auxiliary of the State, an establishment of moral hygiene, a good rule for souls. Owing to all these causes, respect for Christianity is imposed on public opinion as a duty, and even as a matter of decorum. It is unwillingly admitted that a sceptic may be a good Englishman and an honest man. He is blamed who, having had the misfortune to lose his faith, tries to shake that of others.

Letter from Mexico.

Mexico, October 24th, 1871.

DEAR NEWS LETTER:—My news will probably be stale, but other parts of my letter will be perhaps of some interest; besides, judging from the accounts we used to get from Mexico when I was in California, the source from which they came must have been very unreliable, as I shall show by one isolated fact. The opinion promulgated, and generally believed, was as to the Presidential election, for instance, that Juarez was very popular and would be reflected by acclamation, whereas the truth that from Manzanilla to Orizaba, the whole breadth of the Republic, with the exception of the distance from that place to Vera Cruz, I did not hear one person have a good word to say of him. There is no doubt in my mind but that Juarez is the best man they can get, if it were only that thus far he has been enabled to stifle revolutions better and more promptly than any of his predecessors; he possesses, however, other qualities besides that one. But it must be borne in mind that Juarez has occupied the Presidential chair fourteen years, and no people will tolerate any officer, after such a long term, insisting on retaining his office whether they like it or not. If Juarez had gracefully announced his intention, at the approach of the election, of resigning his office, which was all that was required or expected from him, there is little doubt that he would have been renominated and returned from an overwhelming majority, but instead of adopting that popular course, he insisted on retaining his office, and to effect that object at the election, he has resorted to bribery, corruption, coercion and violence; in short, he has used all the appliances within his reach, and having set that pernicious example, Lerdo and Porfirio Dias have followed it to the extent of their means. The result has been that the people were so disgusted that, notwithstanding all the efforts of Juarez and his minions, he has been returned by but a very small majority, if by any majority at all, in spite of suppressed and garbled returns. As a natural consequence, pronunciamientos are expected; indeed, the first took place about three weeks ago. Two scoundrels by the name of Mayer (smells Dutch) and Armendaris let loose four hundred felons from the jail, and with them and others took possession of the citadel of the city of Mexico, in the name of Porfirio Dias (with or without his sanction is not known), but Juarez, with his famous general Rocha, took the place by storm, and report says that in the action three hundred government troops perished and four hundred rebels, many of whom were also taken prisoners, and they say all above a private in rank were executed (the only way of suppressing such revolutions). The Government keeps everything as quiet as possible, but the belief is that there will be a general uprising. There is a rumor here—on what foundation I cannot learn—that the American Government has agreed, in case of need, to furnish all the aid necessary to sustain Juarez and his party. Quien sabe? I will now give you my impression of the general aspect of the country after an absence of seventeen years from it. You remember I came here by the way of Manzanillo, which is a tolerable little harbor, but a very small place, the principal business of which is the export of valuable timbers, which abound in great varieties and can be shipped with great facility, as they are very near the shores. This business is in the hands of two German houses, who have shipped thirty cargoes between January and July. There is a lake a few hundred yards from the town forty miles long, navigable only in the rainy season; I performed the journey with difficulty in a boat. At the head of the lake I found a very small steamboat, but there was not water enough for her to run, on account of the obstruction from the weeds with which the bottom of the lake is covered four feet deep. From the head of the lake to Colima there is a good road. Colima is quite a large place, but as dead as ditch water, everybody complaining of the stagnation of business. From that place to Zapotlan is about twenty-one leagues, so you see I had to go fifty leagues before I could take the stage. Zapotlan is another miserably dull place, and how the people live is a mystery; I believe most have a small patch of corn on which they are chiefly fed. From this place I took the stage for Guadalajara, about thirty-eight leagues, and although I had become accustomed to the sight of dilapidation of towns, villages and haciendas, I was unprepared for the terrible change that I perceived in that large city. In 1849, when I remained there some time, it was quite an active, flourishing place, but now so completely used up that the people are actually leaving it in large numbers. The same decadence, to a greater or less extent, was observable in most other cities. The most flourishing place along the whole road is Leon, where they devote themselves to manufacturing. Resting one day at Lagos it took us seven to get to Mexico by the stage—fare, $45; hotels, $21; baggage, $30 per 100 lbs. On perambulating the city, I was much pleased to see the many improvements that had taken place, chiefly in consequence of the sale of the church property; several new streets have been opened, and the houses built on them, as well as many rebuilt ones, are of a superior style of architecture. Side-walks have been widened, and a beautiful garden made in the great square between the cathedral and the palace; one convent is converted into a public library, the dimensions and beauty of which throw that of your bragging San Franciscans completely into the shade, besides, the metamorphosis may be aptly called converting darkness into light. A monastery is turned into a livery stable where horses are boarded; much better to have stalls for them than cells for a few greasy, lazy monks, who spend most of their time (all their nights) away from the monastery. I could but observe the superior bearing of the military folks; the valor of Mexicans generally has wonderfully increased since the war with the French; the soldiers fight like devils now and have good arms, and duels are of frequent occurrence among civilians. But business is nearly as dull in the capital as in the provinces; there is a total want of confidence, and there can be but little enterprise because the capitalists are leaving and taking their funds with them, as they were all exposed, to be seized at any time by a gang of ruffians called plagiarists, and carried off to some cavern, where they would be kept until they paid a heavy ransom, if they were not murdered before it arrived. This fashion, they say, was introduced by the Spaniards. What country can possibly prosper with such a state of things?—and we are told they are positively connived at and even participated in by certain persons occupying the highest posts in some of the States! The foreign debt of Mexico presents a very interesting problem to solve. The nations to which Mexico was indebted on the accession of the empire ignored the republic, and took the guarantee of the new government for their respective debts, and the question is, now that the empire has fallen, can they fall back on the Republic? I should say certainly not, but the present government is disposed, I understand, to enter into arrangements with some of them, the English among others. A large amount of the British debts (and no doubt that of other nations) is fraudulent; besides, the English have already received more than the Mexicans ever really had from them, without taking into account the amount of revenue on the export of precious metals, believed here to have been unjustly seized by British men-of-war. [Our correspondent writes as the agent of one of the largest haciendas in Mexico. Ed.] Some enterprising Frenchmen have closed up most of the slow-coach English houses in the capital, and the German houses will have to follow suit. These Frenchmen work on the principle of low charges, large and prompt sales with small profits. They have contracted for all the cotton and woolen goods manufactured in the country, the quantity of which is very considerable, and importers cannot compete with them, besides which they import largely and undersell their competitors. The railroad from the capital to Puebla (another large but declining city) has been completed long ago, and there are only 27 leagues to complete between Orizaba and Vera Cruz, which is to be done this year. The hiatus between Puebla and Orizaba, I am told, is to be finished by the end of next year, or the actual contractor will have to forfeit the job to an American company. This railroad has been another English swindle; the company has received much larger sums from the government than the contract called for, and they have not performed their part of the contract by a long shot. The poor Mexicans are much more sinned against than sinning; everybody takes advantage of their necessities and weakness. You may infer from the foregoing facts that Mexico has but a gloomy perspective, and its future seems to be inevitable anarchy, something like that of San Domingo. Its population cannot increase with its constant decimation by revolutions, and instead of any augmentation by immigration, a diminution of the most valuable part of it is constantly taking place by emigration. It is most deplorable to think that a country which the Almighty has made one of the finest on the face of the earth, and full of numberless resources of the richest and most varied description, should be converted by the perverseness of man into (comparatively speaking) a desolate wilderness; but such, alas! is the case. With the immense extent of the Republic and the unfortunate peculiar composition of its inhabitants, it would puzzle the wisest political economist to suggest a practical and feasible remedy. Education, it is true, is making great progress, but of course it can only extend to a very limited number. Lo! the poor Indian.

VIATOR.

—The observance of Thanksgiving has been the fruitful theme of much good satire from the turkeyeaters. They have exuded ridicule no end upon the theory that gluttony is an equivalent for blessings divinely conferred. This is all wrong; there is a subtle but potent relation between the gratitude of the spirit and the stuffing of the flesh. We have ever taught the identity of soul and stomach; these are but different names for one object considered under differing aspects. Thankfulness we believe to be a kind of gas evolved by the action of the gastric fluid upon rich meats. Like all gases it ascends, and so passes out of the esophagus in prayer and psalmody. This beautiful discovery we have tested by convincing experiments in the manner following: EXPERIMENT 1st. A quantity of grass was placed in a large bladder, and a gill of the gastric juice of a sheep introduced. In ten minutes the neck of the bladder emitted a contented bleat. EXPERIMENT 2d. A pound of beef was substituted for the grass, and the fluid of a dog for that of the sheep. The result was a cheerful bark, accompanied by an agitation of the bottom of the bladder, as if it were attempting to wag an imaginary tail. EXPERIMENT 3d. The bladder was charged with a handful of chopped turkey, and an ounce of human gastric juice obtained from the Coroner. At first nothing but a deep sigh of satisfaction escaped from the neck of the bladder, followed by an unmistakable grunt, similar to that of a hog. Upon increasing the proportion of turkey, and confining the gas, the bladder was very much distended, and appeared to suffer great uneasiness. The restriction being removed, the neck distinctly articulated the words "Praise God from whom all blessings flow!" Against such demonstration as this any mere theological theorizing is of no avail.

—The Bulletin has an extremely probable story of a convict in the State Prison, "whose heart has fallen into his stomach," but who experiences no sort of inconvenience from it, except a pain in the left leg! It is not stated whether the heart came up and went into the mouth, and so passed down the throat, or whether it clumped through the side of the stomach like a brick through the head of a drum. We presume that when the vagrant organ shall have digested, the man will get well.

Land Monopoly in California.

One of the most important and serious problems which the people of this State are called upon to solve is the question of land monopoly. The owners of the soil are the rulers of nations, the producing powers which furnish humanity with the bread of life. It is to be lamented that in the State of California, which contains a population of only some 600,000 souls, the tenant system prevails in the interior to an extent which is almost incredible. To this population the area of the State in round numbers is estimated at 160,000 square miles, or 100,000,000 acres. Let us estimate the renters at 5,000, who lease from 40 to 160 acres of land each, for which they pay on an average from $10 to $20. Sometimes they rent their farms on shares, but in the end the result is substantially the same. In the very nature of things these renters can take no deep interest in the welfare of the State, they merely exist by suffrage, and quickly exhaust the soil in procuring therefrom its richest yields at the least possible expense. They build no comfortable homes for themselves or families, plant neither shade trees nor orchards, build no roads or bridges unless compelled to do so by dire necessity, take no interest in the establishment of schools or houses of worship, and in fact become shiftless in their habits. It is the desire of these men to do the very reverse, for the man who loves and tills the soil as its owner is the very best citizen. But such men do not own the soil, and it is not in human nature, as we have said, for them to take a deep interest in that which they merely hold by suffrage. In telling contrast with the renters are the great landed proprietors, few in number, who own vast areas of territory, but never till an acre of it. According to the Stockton Republican, one private individual owns, in the San Joaquin Valley, 350,000 acres, and twelve men own 2,735,000—an average of 174,000 acres each. Other individual men in this city and elsewhere throughout the State own square miles and townships, which in the East would be considered large counties. It is needless to denounce these men as "land grabbers," cormorants and sharks. How they came into possession of their vast landed estates is not now a pertinent question, it is sufficient to know that they have legal possession and good titles. The great question to solve is the manner in which these vast estates may be justly taxed, so as to bring in the State the revenues now evaded through our mistaken land policy, or else so legislate that the proprietors will be forced to sell to immigrants tracts of 160 acres, more or less, at reasonable rates. These landed proprietors cannot be robbed of an acre of their immense domain, any more than they could if individually they possessed only a town lot. Public opinion expressed through the Legislature is the only legitimate way of procuring a solution of this all-important subject. The press and the people, the best interests of the State and of the entire country demand that this problem should meet with the serious attention of the present Legislature. While it must be admitted that in addition to the landed estates, much of the best and fairest land in this State has been granted by Congressional and State subsidies, in one way or another, there are still millions of acres of Government land for sale. In the Tulare Land District it is estimated that there are about two and a half millions of acres of Government land, and some one million of acres in the Kern River country. In the northern portions of the State and in the foot-hills there are great quantities of public lands. The immigrant can procure such lands under the Homestead Law, as a squatter, or pay the Government price. For the first few years he would have to make a hard struggle to gain a foothold. He would find neither houses, roads, schools or churches awaiting him. Markets would be difficult of access and population sparse. But by perseverance, industry and economy, all these wants would be soon supplied. We treat this important question from a practical point of view, considering that the rosy-colored pictures of California climate, and the tooting of horns about the fertility of our soil, has certain drawbacks which should be presented to the immigrant. This State is sadly in want of immigration, and if we speak the plain truth and act rightly, we can soon have a million of solid and substantial citizens.

— The sick-faced champions of mush-and-morality, with their auxiliary cohorts, the Woman Suffragers, have experienced a preliminary defeat in the Supervisors: a committee of that Board has reported in favor of the bill regulating the social evil. Are our ears smitten with a dolorous wail? Doth a prolonged moan go up sunward? Do we hear Soapenlocks in his last strong agony, and is his tight-haired female opulent of grief? Ah! friends, the sceptre is departed from the house of Sentiment, and the dynasty of Hardsense is set up in our midst. The eminently respectable old party who passes his evenings at "the office" shall no longer jeopard the health of his wife who passes hers at home with a "friend," nor embitter the bones of his offspring who do not resemble him. The she-suffrager will have to take out a license and submit to a weekly overhauling. At all of which we elevate the streaming eye, and blubber wildly as we think of the approaching day when the social evil shall spread its blight upon the records of the Police office, and contaminate the books of the Tax Collector! We shudder to think we shall no longer be able to deny that it exists. Go to, Meekcheek; we are chafing thee! And thou, Mildepeech; we rail at thy kind! Madame Fathead, and Miss Primdidity with the dainty nose, ye irk us with your troubled looks. Ye are shocked at this "sanctioning of vice" are ye, darlings? Well, well, ye shall be no party to it. Ye have had your day, like other dogs (male and female created He them) and ye have made a mess of it. Room for the bouncing leper! Make his paths straight.

The American and British Character Contrasted.

The good side, both of American institutions and of American character, came out in strong relief during the Chicago fire, and it is very curious to note how different that good side is from the good side of the British ways and mind. Except in susceptibility, which is greater in the Americans, the two nations resemble each other in all evil, but when a call is made on their virtues, display them in widely different directions. Compare, for instance, the conduct of the Mayor of Chicago with the conduct which, under similar circumstances, would have been pursued by almost any average Englishman. The latter would, we take it, have fought the fire quite as bravely; but we question if he would have recognized as promptly the necessity for illegal action, or, recognizing it, would have acted with such utter contempt of consequences. As the fire died down, greed and selfishness revived in Chicago in their most naked forms. The criminal classes began to plunder the ruins and the ruined; the traders who held stocks of bread and timber demanded unheard-of prices; the hotels raised their tariff to a three-fold figure. The people in self-defense began to shoot and bludgeon the thieves; the remaining shops were threatened by rioters, and it seemed for a few hours as if society were going to pieces.

An English Mayor, we suspect, would have appealed to Mr. Bruce and then sworn in special constables; but the American, accustomed to think of the people as the ultimate sovereign, and sure of support, if he would but act, rose to the level of circumstances at once, proclaimed a state of siege—which he had legally about as much right to do as a parish clerk has—invested General Sheridan with absolute powers, requested the soldiers to shoot criminals at sight, and in six hours had victims and criminals equally in hand. He probably never thought twice about possible consequences, knowing perfectly well that if resisted by force he would be backed in a moment by the armed population, and that if threatened with law no jury would dream of giving a verdict or Magistrate of listening to the complaint. The safety of the city was at stake, and the law must just get out of the way. His next step was even more audacious. The friends of a burglar shot for pillaging a burning house would not, even in England, obtain very much sympathy or redress; but we cannot imagine the circumstances under which in England a provincial Mayor could have issued an order directing bakers to sell bread at eight cents the pound, under penalty of immediate confiscation of their stocks, and commanded hotel keepers to revert to their usual tariffs, as, otherwise, "the Mayor would occupy their houses and run the machines himself."

The Englishman must have given a promise of compensation or a hint of a Bill of Indemnity; but the American had no notion of the necessity of either. There was the people suffering, and he was their representative, and for the removal of that suffering his authority had no more limit than their physical power. Nobody disobeyed or resisted, and to any subsequent action against the Mayor, public opinion would make it impossible for anybody who brought it to live in Chicago. This capacity of developing a dictator for the hour, and supporting and obeying him in the most revolutionary expedients, without formally suspending the laws or demanding legislative aid, is a real feature in American politics, and one of the many resources by which they overcome unexpected calamity, and it seems to us due to the fluidity of their political organization. The people make the laws, and therefore, when the safety of the people is concerned and laws hamper needful action, they think they may suspend them, and the populace secures its dictator ad hoc without any resulting break in the continuity of municipal life.—Spectator.

Siege Operations in the Future.

The Moniteur Universel publishes the following extract of a letter written from Bonn by a German officer: "The French reproach us Germans for the insidious methods we employ in the attack of fortified places. They still cling to old traditions, according to which it is rigorously necessary to effect a breach to obtain an entrance into a besieged town. Consequently they find our method of investing, and compelling a town to surrender by the terror of a bombardment, very strange. But what will they say when the new system of sieges, now under consideration, comes into operation—when they see a large town with its inhabitants and defenders, its houses and its fortifications, all destroyed by the newly-invented system of mining, the power of which is such that nothing can withstand the besiegers? Of course we shall be accused of barbarity, but in that they will be as wrong as all former charges have been. Is it not evident that such methods will render sieges infinitely less frequent, and consequently they will diminish bloodshed? It would be to misunderstand the sagacity and character of our nation to think otherwise; and among the immense results of our method of waging war, it may be asserted that our calculated rigor is greatly to the advantage of humanity, as it is notorious—and has been statistically proved—that bloodshed diminishes in proportion as the science of war is brought to perfection."

— Fire was communicated from one house to another in Philadelphia by a clothes-line.—Echange. (A great many worthy people in this city go about nightly to make clothes-lines non-conductors by stealing the wet garments off them.)

The Neighbor.

[BY ROBERT BUCHANAN.]

"Selina, my daughter Selina,
Look down at your sewing, pray,
You are gazing much too often
At our neighbor over the way."

"At our neighbor? Nonsense, mother!
For him how should I care?
In his window there stands a geranium,
And my eyes look idly there."

"Idly enough, I warrant,
As such things ever began,
Do you think I have not watched you
Nodding to that young man?"

"Nod to our neighbor, mother?
Never, as I aver!
I nod to his fellow lodger,
Miss Jones, the milliner."

"What fluttered into your bosom,
Through the open window-pane?"

"A little white bird, my mother—
See, there it goes again!"

"My girl, what are you reading
There in the window light?"

"Only some pretty verses
I cut from the Journal last night."

"O thou, who at thy casement
Art set like a saint at a shrine,
Hear how I watch and adoreth—
O sweet, that thou were mine."

"Are not the verses pretty?
Mother, why do you frown?"

"Verses are merely rubbish—
What are you writing down!"

"What am I writing, mother?
Oh don't be angry, pray!
I am only marking the linen
We bought the other day."

"Marking the linen, daughter!
Your pen runs far to fast:
Ha! what did you this moment
Out of the window cast?"

"Out of the window, mother?
Nothing; you're wrong once more.
Hark, there's some one knocking;
Let me run to the door."

"Mother, sweet dear mother,
O smooth your angry brow!
Outside the door of the parlor
Our neighbor is waiting now!"

"Our neighbor! What is he wanting?
Show him up the stair—
(Tis as I said, Selina!)
Good day, sir. Take a chair,

"Nay, sir; I pray be seated—
Take the gentleman's hat, my dear.
To what am I indebted
For the honor of seeing you here?"

"O, madam, mine is the honor;
Honored am I and blest,
That you will see for certain
When I explain the rest."

"Madam, dearest madam,
For many and many a day
I have loved your daughter Selina,
And watched her from over the way."

"Her youth, her sweetness, her beauty,
Have witched me day and night;
I have sat whole days at the window
Feasting upon the sight."

"Always gentle and smiling,
Always busy and neat!
The light of the gloomy dwelling,
The sunbeam of the street!"

"Long was I dumb and timid,
But I plucked up heart at last,
This morning a little letter
I in at the window cast."

"And there in the lane I trembled,
Full of a wild affright,
Till out of the window fluttered
This scrap of linen white."

"See, with indelible letters,
Her answer is written here:
Your gentle daughter, Selina,
Knows me and holds me dear."

"See, on my knees unto her
I kneel, and again entreat,
My heart and my humble fortune
I place beneath her feet."

"Selina, my daughter Selina,
Was this the little bird?
O, child, you have deceived me
Finely, upon my word!"

"Is it thus you mark your linen?
Is it thus you spend the day?
Ah! love is ever contriving,
Whatever we old folks say."

"Sir, since you truly love her,
You shall wed her by-and-by,
If your character, on inquiry,
Does not your looks belie."

"Selina, you may kiss him!—
Close the house as we may,
Whether by door or by window,
Love will discover a way!"

— On the morning after a recent ball at Sucker Flat, the level sunbeams stole warmly into the dressing-room and gilded the nose of an unknown babe with a rich crimson glory. It was a wee thing, and as it lay there wrapped in the peaceful slumber of one who has not yet learned to cheat, one might have heard the soft stir of angels' wings about its couch, and smelled the odors of heaven on its light breath. Strange place for this gentle creature, so innocent, so sweet, so fresh from the hand of its Maker! How marvelous that the maddened surge and swirl of fashionable dissipation should have left so rare a deposit! Suddenly the great blue eyes opened, the red lips parted, disclosing their wealth of pearls, a smile like silent music settled into the hearts of the hushed spectators as the blessed infant spake: "Where in thunder's my maw?" We suspect this brat wanted to stuff it.

A Well-Deserved Name.

"It don't signify much," said Mr. Jerusha M. Spongattle, as he gently expectorated on the polished steel fender of my drawing-room, which he had entered on the introduction of our agents at New York, "It don't signify much how I came there, but I was at Hungry Bar on business, and as I was strolling up for a drink along with Judge Pegler, I sez to the Judge, 'A more orkard-lookin' cuss than that ere I never see!' alluding to a tall uncommon strong-built fellow, which was sitting outside his cabin blowing his bacca. 'Hush!' sez the Judge. 'What for?' sez I. 'Wal, sez he, 'I reckon that's The Quietest Chap on the Bar!' 'Then why on airth,' was my observation, 'did you hush that sharp?' 'I guess,' sez the Judge, 'it's a little rough on the Quietest Chap on the Bar to go for his Christ n forbearance.' Wal, it struck me from the twinkle in the Judge's eye—which were one, he having left the other somewhere in a saloon at 'Friaco, subsequent to a spirited argument with one of the Pioneers, which he had acquired the art of gongling to that degree as an angel might have envied him—meaning the Pioneer, noi the Judge. Wal, seeing the twinkle in the Judge's eye, it seemed to occur to me as there was something in that there apperlation as would pan out well. So, sez I to the Judge, 'How come thish yer party to be bound to be The Quietest Man on the Bar?' 'Take a chaw,' sez the Judge, handing me his baccy. Which I did. 'We wasn't long,' continued the Judge, 'finding out how all thunder quiet he was. He come here about a couple o' months ago, just when everybody was getting sick o' the place and swearing as the bar had petered out. But thish yer darned cuss hadn't been at it a couple of days before he struck gold. I reckon that made us wild, and there was a sorter secret understanding as we must go for him. What call had he to come like that and find what we'd all been looking for ever so long without striking it. Wal, the third day he was up at the saloon, and happened to ax Cunnie Snages to liquor, which the Cunnie refusing, a difficulty arose, and the upshot was that thish yer new cuss quit the place, leaving behind him three bullets, two in the mirror and one in Missisippi Jake, and taking away three or four of the Cunnie's fingers in his left-hand trouser's pocket. The next morning a slight altercation between him and Carrotty Jim eventuated in the latter's being deposited in a wooden box in an abandoned claim and covered up with earth, which though of a stony nature he did not find discommodious. The next evening English Harry was unexpectedly called on to leave a widder and orphans unprovided for—somewhere—owing to having inadvertently stepped in front of the stranger's six-shooter during an argument about a right bower. As these here casualties was piling up some, a few prominent citizens convened themselves with the object of appointing a Vigilance Committee, with a view to removing the unfortinet cause of the accidents. While they was so occupied, the unfortinet cause walked in and argued the matter so logically that two members of the Committee was carried home on shutters, and The Chair will carry a fractured collar-bone and a ciatrux on his left cheek to his grave. Since that time there ain't been,' sez the Judge with great satisfaction, 'there ain't been a peaceabler chap on the Bar. He don't never get into any quarrels nor difficulties—nobody never thinks of interfering with his calm person. Passing over the day or two doorn' which, so to speak, he was prospecting, he has been located on this yer Bar coming near on seven weeks, and he ain't been known to exchange an orkard word with anybody, consequently,' sez the Judge, accommodating himself with another plug, 'he is invariably spoken of as The Quietest Chap on the Bar. Which he is! Let's liquor!' And," said Mr. Jerusha P. Spongattle, "I have that opinion of the Judge's veracity that I feel perfectly certain that the party in question was sech! What a blessing it is," said Jerusha contemplatively, "what a blessing it is to be endowed with a Christ'n and forbearin' spirit. I love a peaceable disposition like that chap's—oh, I du!"—London Flun.

— In the Turner-Ortiz breach of promise case, a witness testified as follows concerning etiquette in our sister Republic: "The climate in Summer is very warm, the thermometer ranging from ninety to one hundred degrees in the shade. When you meet a friend there, to embrace him is the invariable custom. 'The pleasure of kissing your hand' is a common expression, and is used even by merchants in business letters." It must be delightful to embrace a fat male with the thermometer at one hundred in the shade. As to "the pleasure of kissing your hand," we apprehend that it does not mean very much, except when used by a merchant in a business letter. Then it is undoubtedly sincere, and being properly interpreted, signifies "the felicity of cheating you."

— They have been holding an earthquake down at Iquique, at which all the inhabitants assisted. Everybody scampered to the high ground like a timorous kitten flying before a metallic dog. As they fled they quoted Byron with an earnestness appropriate to the occasion—"The sea, the sea, the deep blue sea!" They divested themselves of their clothing, lay down with rails and shutters and planks hugged tightly to their palpitating bosoms, and waited for the tidal wave to lift them skyward. Old ocean had just then found a nice dead herring upon the beach, and in wooing it he quite forgot to pursue the more unpleasant creatures. For so ridiculous an earthquake we do not remember to have lately prayed.

Where Our Money Goes.

One of the great qualities of this good city of San Francisco is its ability to pay taxes; another and distinct quality is the unhesitating good humor with which it hands over the money. Whether it may be the State, the city, or the Federal Government which puts out the hand, it is immediately filled with gold pieces or greenbacks, whichever will be most agreeable to the taxing power. There never seems to be much inquiry as to what disposition is made of the money, but the demand is deemed a matter of course, and a kind of thankfulness seems to be felt when it is met. It is true that the sum of the combined demands gradually swells in amount, and draws relentlessly upon the working capital of the people, but what precise equivalent is received for it does not appear. The good people of this quiet burgh have now been twenty years in the enjoyment of a triple government; or we might say, perhaps, without being wide of the mark, a quadruple government; that is to say in order of rank, the Federal Government, the State Government, the City Government, and the street contractors. Each one of these has its little bill which must be annually settled, and whether the crops or the mines produce much or little there is no let up in the progressive figures of the bills. During the last ten years each tax list has become more onerous, and we may as well give the amounts paid under each head during the first ten years of the city's existence, and during the last ten years. In the first five years in which San Francisco was blest with a Municipal Government, the members thereof showed a good deal of the inclination and much of the genius which has made the Tweed dynasty so bright and shining a light in New York. The city taxes rose from $350,000 in 1851 to $1,200,124 in 1854, but passed through the furnace of reform, the amount sank to $350,000 in 1857. From that date, however, year by year the amount has risen until it is now $2,908,304. During the first ten years of the city's growth, the only taxes imposed by the Federal Government were customs duties, and these averaged $1,500,000 per annum. In the last ten years they have averaged nearly $6,700,000 per annum. In 1863 the Federal Government levied internal revenue taxes. These have averaged over $2,000,000 per annum in gold. If we draw off from official tables the amount of taxes paid during two periods of ten years each, we have the following reminder of the fleeting nature of wealth:

	Ten Years to 1861.	Ten Years to 1872.	Increase in Ten Years.
City Taxes.....	$ 5,725,975	$ 9,096,384	$ 3,370,409
State Taxes.....	2,145,723	8,570,577	6,424,854
Internal Revenue.....	none	19,915,767	19,915,767
Customs Duties.....	14,626,109	66,298,758	51,672,649
Total .....	$22,497,807	$103,881,486	$81,383,679

The sum of $81,383,679 has been drawn from the tax-payers in the last ten years in excess of their payments in the first ten years. The whole sum paid has been $103,881,486, or $10 per head per annum for every soul in the city. In order to estimate this we may remember that the Hon. George Walker, in the Massachusetts House of Representatives, said that the people of that State paid $20 per head per annum, and he remarked thereon, "We are now burdened with taxes to a degree which would have bound a poorer people to the earth; to a degree which no people, not even the people of Massachusetts, can permanently endure." If we remember that that State is the richest commonwealth in the country, and the taxes he spoke of are equal to one-fourth of those paid in this city, we may estimate the comparative weight. But there is this addition: of the amount paid $66,298,758 was income for duties, and it was shipped out of the State. The local expenses of the Federal Government are paid from the internal revenue taxes. In respect of the duties, she is therefore a great non-resident receiver of revenues. But these taxes and the mode of collecting them are by no means the whole of the evils of the tax-payers. There comes the reformers opening streets, pulling down one side at the expense of the other, and charging millions to the property holders in order to prepare for traffic which no pains are taken to procure. The ultimate means of the city to foot all these tax bills depends upon the productiveness of the interior, the quantities of agricultural produce which may be raised and directed upon this bay for exportation in exchange for commodities useful to the farmers. There are lands and capabilities which might suffice for an indefinite amount of lucrative commerce, with the judicious outlay of capital to bring them into play, one-tenth part of the money spent in taxes would, if properly extended, add millions per annum to the city's trade and means of wealth. As it is, the money is uselessly squandered, while the lands which should be made productive remain unsettled.

— A city journal republishes from the Argory a tale<sup>sm</sup> entitled, "The Ghost of Russian Hill." Persons who take spooks in their wiliness interested in the perusal of it; we were not. It is needless to say that the entire narration is pronounced a lie of extraordinary magnitude; a gentleman who lives upon the malignant eminence assures us that no ghost has ever dared to present himself there after two o'clock in the afternoon, for fear of being blown into the Bay. We suppose he might bring along his tomb-stone stitched up in the tail of his shroud.

— Mr. William Morris' new poem is entitled "Love is Enough." Then why this poem?

The Messenger at Night.

A face at the window

A tap on the pane:

Who is it that wants me

To-night in the rain?

I have lighted my chamber,

And brought out my wine,

For a score of good fellows

Were coming to dine.

The dastards have failed me,

And sent in the rain

The man at the window,

To tap on the pane!

I hear the the rain patter,

I hear the wind blow;

I hate the wild weather,

And yet I must go!

I could moan like the wind now,

And weep like the rain,

But the Thing at the window

Is tapping again!

It beckons—I follow;

Good-bye to the light!

I am going, oh, whither?

Out into the night!

The Mariposa Estate.

At stated intervals since the first of October there has appeared an advertisement in the Alta headed "Las Mariposas Estate, Notice of Sale," with a gradually increasing list of postponement of such sale from period to period. Mariposa is to California what Cuba is to Spain, one of the brightest jewels in the dominion. There is not a portion of the State where the veins of gold-bearing quartz are more universally abundant, nor any where the gold is more equally diffused. Like Cuba, also, its wealth has been its bane, and its possession has been a source of discord. We refer to the Mariposa estate, of course, which embraces the choicest section of the country. It would be idle to trace the causes which led to Colonel Fremont's embarrassments. They were chiefly owing to the want of power to handle this vast property singly and alone. Suffice it to say that the various judgment creditors of the estate formed themselves into a joint stock corporation for the purpose of developing the boundless resources of this property. At the head of this body corporate stood Mark Brumagim, who for many years has been the active agent of the claimants on the estate. Finally a company was formed in New York called the "Mariposa Land and Mining Company," which proposed to consolidate all titles, interest and claims whatever by one grand purchase of the whole estate, accepting all the liabilities for the purpose of liquidating them, and reserving a large capital in order to work the mines and otherwise develop the immensely rich resources of the Mariposa lands.

This sale was absolutely necessary in order to obtain legal control of the estate, and collect and continue the titles, and Mark Brumagim became the Trustee under a general conveyance for the purpose of carrying out this object. He arrived here and advertised the sale by public auction of the whole estate as already mentioned. Immediately there arose a factions opposition to the sale, which, up to the present time of writing, has been postponed no less than twelve times. Now, as our aim has ever been the welfare and growth of California, we want to know why this, the fairest spot in our State, is to lie barren, desolate and unimproved? There are schemes for bringing water that are dormant on account of this senseless litigation; there are millions of dollars buried in the ground till the estate can be worked, and it is a shame that a pettifoggish suit should retard a sale which would open up so large a tract of country, and increase the prosperity, the population and the wealth of the State of California. We shall examine closely into this subject, and will not let the matter alone until it is thoroughly sifted and laid before the public, and then the public will be able itself to judge who are the obstructors to the development of the immense latent resources of the great estate known by the name of "Las Mariposas."

English Laborers and Beer Drinking.

Important statistical information on the subject of English laborers and beer drinking was recently read before the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The number of laborers in England and Wales, including their families, is estimated to be a little over a third of the population, namely, 8,144,000. Of this number 1,600,000 are adult males. There are about 200,000 skilled artisans, who with their families number 1,174,000; their annual earnings range from $200 to $365. There are about 800,000 half-skilled workmen, and, including their families, number 4,000,000, whose annual earnings range between $20 and $26. The agricultural and unskilled laborers are estimated 600,000 able-bodied men, who represent a population of 2,657,000. These three classes, with their families, have a total yearly income estimated at $1,380,000,000. Of this immense revenue the laborers of both countries expend nearly to any per cent. in the purchase of malt and spirituous liquors. During the year ending September 30, 1870, the brewers for the British public took out 32,623 licenses, from which the Government received an income of $1,941,945. Now in regard to this magnificent twenty per cent. generosity which the sturdy British laborers cast into their capacious bowels, we know we shall have to endure homilies from peanut philosophers and vegetarian inanimates. With an excruciating facial elongation they will deplore the evils of intemperance, suggest saving banks and grow morbidly philanthropic over their transatlantic "bone and sinew" blood relations. Meanwhile the English and Welsh laborers (the latter as true Britons far above the English mongrels) will grow fat and merry over their beer, while the philosophers and vegetarians may have to bier it elsewhere.

Leaves from a Lady's Diary.

Nov. 29.—What strange people there are in the world. Alfred P—— called on me this bitterly cold day with a pair of white pants on. I remember an Englishman once telling me that if a man was seen walking down Regent street, in London, on Christmas day with white trowsers on, he was immediately set down as a student either of Oxford or Cambridge. Only two words in people's mouths now, rain and turkey. It is positively a bore to go out. Charley O—— came to pour out his griefs to me; he is fearfully jealous of his wife, and it is only at such times that he is in love with her. Men are so ridiculous. They fancy that they are jealous because they love; it's nothing of the sort; they are in love because they are jealous, and when one proves to them that there is not the slightest ground for jealousy they are no longer in love.

Nov. 30.—Thanksgiving Day. Went away from all invitations. I hate the conventional dinner, so Henry and I went to Crystal Springs to the L——s. Drove out after dinner. It was very cold but very lovely. Went to the reservoir and stayed there till it got dark, waiting for the moon. There wasn't a breath of air, and night stole quietly on us and the lake was quite black, and as I looked at it I remembered that line of Leighton's—

"The stars
Come stealthily at night to bathe like nymphs
That shame to strip until the sun is gone."

Dec. 1.—What a nice thing it is to be a prima donna and telegraph independent refusals of tens of thousands of dollars, like Louise Kellogg, at the same time the professional career of a famous singer must harden her heart. She has no compassion for the struggles, the anxiety, the wear and tear, and frequently the ruin of the man that engages her. He pays her thousands for the chance of getting one or two for himself. She, under the convenient shelter of an agent, dictates her own terms, insists upon being paid beforehand, knowing very well that there are others waiting, ready and willing to accept her proposal should the one decline them. It is supreme power as long as it lasts, but that's the rub. Went to the Minstrels to see a burlesque on opera bouffe, Offenbach in burnt cork. B—— came in the afternoon; he always makes me gloomy; he won't be comforted, but continually recounts his misfortunes, as if he were the only one that had ever suffered. As somebody says:

"And sorrow, like the searchers of the slain,
Turns up the cold, dead faces, one by one
Of prostrate joys and wishes, but in vain."

Book Notices.

MORTON HOUSE. By the author of "Valerie Aylmer." Published by Appleton & Co., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

One of the best and most readable novels of the season. The scene is laid in the South some years before the war. The plot is sensational, but the characters are well drawn, the dialogue spirited, and the interest is sustained throughout. We recommend it.

THE PREY OF THE GODS. By Florence Marryatt. Published by Harper Bros., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

This book won't do. Miss Marryatt is writing for money now-a-days, and her novels show it. They are frightfully trashy. We remember her first books, "Forever and Forever," "Woman Against Woman," etc. How good they were; but a novel every six months is decidedly beyond her powers.

MONSIEUR ANTOINE. By George Sand. Published by T. B. Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

This is the sixth volume in the new edition of George Sand's works now publishing by Peterson. It is finely illustrated, and, like all the works of the great French novelist, highly interesting.

HISTORY OF LOUIS PHILIPPE, KING OF THE FRENCH. By John S. C. Abbott. Published by Harper Bros., New York; A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

The Abbotts, with their Illustrated Histories, have done much towards educating this generation of Americans, by presenting in a pleasant way and in a small compass, all the leading acts in the lives of the most famous characters in the world's history. The career of Louis Philippe is full of the strangest ups and downs, and all the events narrated are sustained by documentary evidence.

We acknowledge the receipt from Roman's of three volumes of the "Handy Volume" edition of Dicken's Works, published by Appleton & Co., New York. "Our Mutual Friend," "Martin Chuzzlewit," "The Old Curiosity Shop," and "American Notes." Also a new novel by Marian James, "The Diamond on the Hearth," and a new edition of a "Naturalist's Voyage Around the World," by Charles Darwin, M.A., F.R.S., author of "Origin of the Species" and "Descent of Man."

"Every Horse Owner's Training Manual" has just been laid upon our table. It is written by C. Granville Johnstone, and professes to instruct in breeding, breaking, training and educating the trotting horse. We are not horsey, but as far as we know, the remarks appear to be full of good sense.

— Sir Wm. Thomson's siphon recorder is the great telegraph novelty of the day. The reading of the signals is effected by means of a siphon of capillary glass tube, about two inches long, the shorter end of which dips into a dish of ink, while the larger hangs down, in front of a paper strip moved forward by clock-work. The miniature glass siphon is connected, by a very fine aluminium wire, with a coil suspended between the poles of an electro-magnet, and is moved backwards as it is deflected to the right or to the left. To persuade a camel to get through the eye of a needle would, under ordinary circumstances, not be a more difficult feat than to get ink through the capillary tube under ordinary pressure. But it is actually ejected in a tiny stream from the lower end of the siphon, by the simple and ingenious expedient of keeping the ink electrified to a high tension. It is a well-known fact that, when any liquid is electrified, its particles repelling each other, it is enabled to flow through the finest orifice; and this fact, judiciously taken advantage of by Sir William Thomson, has enabled him to produce a frictionless pen point. The electrification of the ink in the reservoir is done by a rotating electrophorus or replenisher, kept in movement by an electro-magnetic machine.

— General Capron, late Commissioner of Agriculture of the United States, and his party have been received with signal honor by the Japanese Government. They are engaged to take charge of measures for the development of the large northern island of Yesso. Great changes have taken place in Japan since the close of the war that reestablished the Mikado in the temporal supremacy of his predecessors and drove the Tycoon into retirement. The Government is in favor of the Shinto form of religion, while the late Government was Buddhist. The people, however, seem at present but little devoted to either. The gorgeous Buddhist temples are fast going to decay. Beheading as a punishment for crime has been replaced, probably with but little difference to the criminal, by hanging, at least in most cases. Harukiri is rapidly going out of practice. English, French, and German are taught in schools managed entirely by Japanese, and well taught too, English having rather the preference. Altogether, the avidity of the people for knowledge is extreme. Of the four papers in Yokohama, three are English and one is French. English engineers are building two railroads, the one between Yokohama and Yeddo, the other between Kobe and Osaka. The road from Yokohama to Yeddo has been building for eighteen months, and will be opened next spring.

— It was stated some months ago that a number of young men—graduates of Oxford—had gone to America with the somewhat Quixotic intention of fighting their way up from the very bottom of the social ladder. An amusing letter from one of the young fellows gives some particulars of his own and his companions' occupations. The writer is a waiter in a Western Hotel, and, though he makes more money than "fifteen out of twenty English barristers," he is tired of the "job," and thinks of turning cattle-drover, "which pays nearly as well and is altogether manlier work." Two of the young men who went out with him are cattle-drivers already between Texas and Kansas. Another is wood-cutting; and one gentleman, more eccentric than all the others, has taken to brushing boots, in which "trade" it would seem money may be made at a great rate. The college friend to whom the letter is written is advised to come out and begin at once; but he says he does not "see it at all."

— The London Lancet, high medical authority in foreign professional circles, calls attention to the enormous manufacture in England of the new sedative drug, chloral. It states that it is sold by tons a week, and quotes a letter from Baron Liebig, affirming that one German chemist manufactures and sells half a ton every week. No such quantity is used in medicine, and the Lancet seems half afraid that it gets into beer. The London Spectator thinks there is a simpler explanation: "Taking chloral is the new and popular vice, particularly among women, and is doing as much harm as alcohol. The drug is kept in thousands of dressing-cases, and those who begin its use often grow so addicted to it that they pass their lives in a sort of contented stupefaction. Chloral drunkards will soon be an admitted variety of the species." The testimony of American physicians confirms the view taken by the two British periodicals here referred to.

— Dr. Burg, in revising the different statistics of deaths from cholera, during its last outbreak in Paris, in 1864-5, finds that out of 36,332 artisans in brass and copper there were only 16 deaths, viz., 6 per 1,000. In other statistics he finds among 5,650 coppersmiths, founders of bronze and manufacturers of brass instruments, not a single death is recorded from cholera. In the Society of the Bon-Accord, formed in Paris in 1819, and composed only of workers in bronze, there has not been a single member attacked by cholera since the foundation of the society; and we may add to these curious and interesting facts that the city of Mio Tinto, protected, as it is, by the surrounding copper mines, has never been visited by the epidemic, although it rages all the surrounding provinces.

— The following is the length of the proposed Canada Pacific Railway, by the Ottawa Valley. From Montreal to Ottawa, 115 miles; from Ottawa to Mattawan, 195; from Mattawan to Fort Garry, 985; from Fort Garry to Yellow Head Pass, 925; thence to limits of British Columbia, 52; route by the Upper Fraser River (British Columbia) by "short cut," 445; distance from Ottawa Valley, at Mattawan, 2,467 miles; and total distance from Montreal to Pacific Coast, 2,777 miles.

— A splendid monument of Carrara marble will be erected next Spring at Saus, in Savoy, in honor of Germano Sonnemeller, the constructor of the Mont Cenis Tunnel, who died a few weeks before his great work had been inaugurated.

— Sheriff Fraser, having given an opinion that the Dean of the Medical Faculty of the University of Edinburgh could not refuse, legally, to admit the female medical students to the preliminary examination, the Dean admitted them. On Saturday the Senatus decided that no further difficulties were to be placed in the way of the ladies as regards either matriculation or preliminary examination, both these points having been definitely settled in their favor two years ago.

— Dr. Richardson read a paper at a late meeting of the Medical Society of London on the possibility of destroying animals intended for human consumption without the infliction of pain. The author described two modes of painless death, viz.: by electricity and by the inhalation of narcotic vapors; and explained a plan by which a light narcotic vapor could be rendered immediately effective for the object in view.

— The great hobby of the Khedive of Egypt is to collect fine illustrated books. Strange as it may seem, he possesses quite a number of splendid old Latin prayer-books, with quaint pictures, drawn by monks in the Middle Ages.

— Mr. D. D. Home, the spiritualist, was married on October 17th to the youngest daughter of his Excellency the late Hon. Basil de Gloumeline, Councillor of State to the Emperor of Russia.

— The Austrian Government support the Municipality of Vienna in allowing the Old Catholics to worship in the city churches.

— In Paris not above one hundred private houses were destroyed. In Chicago no less than 12,000 are stated to be utterly in ashes.

— Russian has become the commercial language of the northern Japanese ports, and English that of the southern ports.

— In Hungary £11,000,000 has been or will be invested by the Government in the building of railways and a seaport.

— It iz our duty (says Billings) tew pray for them who revile and persekute us, but I don't kno az we are obliged tew let them kno it. A young lady wants to know whether a girl may be sure a man loves her unutterably when he sits in her presence for an hour without speaking.

— When the Grand Duke Constantine was in England, the various military bands had taken care to study, besides the Russian national hymn, the popular air of Russia, "Karé Saragan," meaning nothing more than "the Red Petticoat." On the Grand Duke's first public appearance in London the band of the Horse Guards, after having duly drummed forth the first-named magnificent air, struck up with unwonted vivacity the second. The Grand Duke immediately turned round sharply to his aide-de-camp, and bade him request the band to desist and play some other melody. Ever after the order was given beforehand to refrain from playing the "Karé Saragan," and it was never played again under the same circumstances. "Why will they persecute me with that eternal 'Red Petticoat'?" is said to have been the Grand Duke's exclamation on hearing it begun by the band of the Horse Guards. But the interest of the mystery goes on increasing, for we understand that orders have been sent out to Cataseky, the Russian ambassador to the United States, to warn the band-masters to avoid the "Red Petticoat" on the arrival of the Grand Duke Alexis at New York.

— It is just possible that we have not yet heard the last of that awful diplomatic muddle, the Slesvig-Holstein question. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Eastern Budget gives currency to the rumor circulating "in well-informed circles" that the real object Prince Gortschakoff had in going to Berlin was to discuss with Prince Bismarck the North Slesvig controversy. Russia, says the writer, has decided, in view of the growth of an imposing German fleet in the Baltic, to take energetic measures for securing the fulfillment of the 5th article of the Treaty of Prague, by right of which Denmark claims the portion of North Slesvig of which she has been deprived. Russia considers that there is no way of preserving her maritime position in the Baltic except by strengthening Denmark and securing her neutrality. Hence we have visions pictured to us of more serious complications.

— A curious rumor has gained great credit, and perhaps deservedly so. Count d'Arnim is believed to have proposed to M. Thiers that the 50,000 Prussian soldiers who are still living in and on Champagne shall evacuate the French territory on condition that France shall waive her objections which she, in concert with England, raised, in 1869, against the incorporation of Luxembourg in the German Empire. Mr. Gladstone might not, perhaps, be content to throw the keys of the Scheldt into the Thames; he may remember Lord Palmerston's death-bed injunction, for England to sacrifice her last soldier and her last shilling to save Antwerp from falling into the clutches of the French Emperor; and our late Premier's objection to Lubens' famous city being converted into a French port would exist d'fortiori against its conversion into a German haven.

— The Débats remarks that at the very moment when the Emperor Napoleon declared that he had never cast a longing eye on Belgium, the Prussian official journal cited documents showing the diplomatic intrigues which had been set on foot with the object of annexing that country. "Whatever may be the humiliation to France," adds the Débats, "at revelations of this nature, France being in a great measure implicated in the misdoings of a regime which she submitted to for twenty years, it is useful to make those revelations, and in this case the advantage is greater than the injury. The essential thing now is that that regime should never be restored; and it is not, therefore, a matter of indifference that the Powers which might be tempted to favor the return of the Bonapartes should thoroughly understand that Napoleon III. while in power was the public enemy of Europe."

— A letter to the Univers contains a story of a remarkably bulky taper having been sent to the Vatican—no one knew by whom—accompanied by a request that it should be placed in the pope's private chapel, and lit during his mass. The request was complied with, and the pope, seeing it burning in a corner of the chapel, ordered it to be immediately extinguished. It was opened after mass in his presence, and found to contain a small Orsini shell.

— Count Reust is likely to come to this country (England) as Austrian Ambassador. The post of Minister at the Court of St. James is one of the highest and most distinguished in the gift of the Imperial Government, and no appointment could break more gently the fall of the great South German Minister.

— Rochefort is so destitute of money that he has to live on the common prison fare. His friends have all deserted him, and he says that, after he has been transported to the frontier of France, he will have to solicit an appointment as reporter on a Belgian newspaper.

— Victor Hugo's new work, a poem, entitled "The Terrible Year," contains three pages in denunciation of George Bancroft, the ambassador of the United States at Berlin. The first of these denunciatory poems is entitled "The Fallen Minister."

— That useful canal, hewn by the echoes of moldy ideas, is already muddy from the tread of the intellects "reduced to the compass of the lower classes," as they contemptuously style their patrons.—Chronicle. [For carefully compounding contradictory metaphors into a whole of perfectly congruent unintelligibility, our contemporary has no superior and few equals. A canal hewn by echoes, and muddy from the tread of intellects, is an unique piece of engineering astoundingly defiled.]

Outside.

Just a gleam through the darkness—	Just a face in the lamplight;
The lift of two eyes from a book—	A hand, and some glittering hair;
Agance . . . but some glances are heaven!	But hearts have been broken it's said,
To such eyes 'tis given	And white steel stained red
To make Paradise in a look.	For faces less faultlessly fair.

Just a girl in her beauty,
 Her glory of freshness and youth;
 But what has earth better to sigh for,
 To live for—to die for—
 Than innocence, beauty, and youth?

—Temple Bar.

— A man with a stealthy sneak in his gait—who comes upon you from behind with a catfish tread, and vanishes from before your face like a silent smoke—a smirking smiler, who prefaces every shallow remark by begging pardon with his eyes, and then talks polite foolishness to the toe of your boot—who sidles up to a lunch table, and shambles gingerly three-quarters of the way round an oyster before attacking it—whose most direct and positive movement is a hesitating wiggle—whose eye seeks the corner of its socket as naturally as a kitten sneaks under a bed—who ambles uneasily along the street with the slinking limp of a dog with mutton on his breath and wool in his teeth—ecce homo, Agapius Honcharenko! This weed-snake—this sugar-clad human pill—this incarnate bad smell tiptoeing silently up to honest noses—is the most nearly complete in all his appointments of any merely mortal nuisance with which this unhappy city is afflicted. Why he is suffered to spill himself along the clean gravel walks of society we do not know; why his presence is permitted to taint the air which gentlemen must breathe we can only vaguely conjecture. The man was once an honest Tartar, decently maintaining a blameless existence as an obscure nomad in his native wild. By some oversight on the part of Nature he was permitted to escape into the great world, and has ever since been dodging about amongst the forests of honest men's skins, oftener stepped upon than kicked, and oftener deserving both evils than enduring either. His career in San Francisco, where he has put up his honor at auction and knocked it down to the highest bidder, has been marked by a greater multitude of assorted meannesses than can easily be computed. We will give a rough estimate, and set them down at a round million. If this is considered an exaggeration we shall be happy to prove, by copious affidavits, two or three, of such a character that the rest will be readily conceded. Meanwhile, however, lest it should turn out that we are lying, we ask in behalf of Mr. Honcharenko a suspension of public opinion until the next issue of his paper, the Alaska Herald. That will undoubtedly contain matter that will make all his former baseness appear quite insignificant—in comparison.

— The following extract received by the Delhi Gazette from Hongkong refers to the Korean expedition. The correspondent writes: "You ask about the Korean expedition. It was a thorough flasco, as I have learnt from a private source which is entirely trustworthy. The Americans, when landed, went looting and broke away from their officers. They retreated, not from the Koreans, but from their own people, leaving two of their guns behind and losing a steam launch. They had only from four to five men killed, and brought away one wounded man. All this speaks for itself." We wonder who the correspondent is that wrote the above.

— It seems that there is such a thing as a National Presbyterian Board of Church Erection, and the Secretary thereof says that from the entire Synod of the Pacific, last year, this Board received seventy-one dollars. During the single month of October, the pious Californians alone asked for three thousand five hundred dollars out of its funds. We are the most generous people in the world, sir—particularly those of us who have been converted.

— The Advocate (Advocatus Diaboli) says it is pleased to learn that there is a good degree of religious interest in the church at Fairfield, and the Brother Sheriff is encouraged in his work. The Sheriff of the county, however, looks on with a grave shake of the head, as if he needed encouragement in his work. "A good degree of religious interest" always makes toil for this worthy official.

— We admire the youth who recently drowned himself because the Darwinian theory degraded him. There is a healthy sincerity and earnestness about such an act, upon which one cannot expend too much respect. But we do think that one who can serenely endure the belief that he was created a little lower than the angels, ought to stand being told that he is the son of a monkey.

Found.

In dreams, long years ago, I saw a face— Yet once we met: blithe was my heart, I
A woman's—noble, sweet and fair, [place Deeming attained the goal I sought; [ween,
That shone upon me from some happy But ah! the world's cold shadow grew be-
And bade me seek her there. And still I found her not. [tween,
So forth I went and traversed many ways, She died: I sought her grave with solemn Peopled with fair, and rich, and young, Thinking to lighten my despair. [cheer,
And sometimes paused to wonder or to gaze! found a form of clay, within a bier,
But found not her among. But her—I found not there!

What more? The flesh decays; but in my heart
She lives as ever, fresh and fair.
O God, who mad'st us, she is where Thou art,
And I shall find her—there!

—Julian Hawthorne.

The Rain.

We question whether Thanksgiving day would have been so fully appreciated as it was, had not the seasonable and welcome rain-fall occurred. Men greeted one another in the streets as if they had escaped some great calamity. Even the Bishop Hattos of our community, the grain hoarders, forgot for awhile their greed of gain in the general joy that prevailed. For verily the clouds did drop fatness, and from Shasta to San Bernardino rises the song of thanks. And what an exhilarating sense of freshness there is in the air after a good heavy rain, like that we have just had. What a cleansing of our streets, such as no mechanical means could effect. What a feeling of purity and life and health does such bestow, and what bountiful wealth does it insure to us. When the floodgates of the sky were opened, the sound of labor was heard all over the land; the plow turned up the rich soil, the mills crushed the precious ore, the water ran along the ditches on the mountain tops and the miner filled his sluices; there was the hum of industry throughout the State, and the inhabitants were roused by the earnest of a good and prosperous season.

The New City Hall.

In a recent issue we complimented the Bulletin on its report of the work now in progress on the New City Hall, but when we come to its editorial on the same subject we find it far from faultless. Take the assertion that the Legislature appropriated a million of dollars for the work, and supposed a sufficiently commodious and handsome edifice could be erected for that sum, whereas the Legislature named a million and a half of dollars for the purpose, and evidently thought that any sum less would be insufficient. We believe that the authorized amount will prove enough. We have every reason to believe that the Commissioners are attending assiduously to their business, and no better men could be found for the place. The public will be satisfied in the end. Push on the work, gentlemen.

— The Upigee Society, it seems, will hold a Christmas festival. May we be permitted to ask to which class of idiots the Upigee Society belongs! From the fact that the festival is to be held in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, we infer that it belongs to the pious class. Which the pious class is a very excellent class, but somewhat given to cheating.

— The report that the Pope has declined a throne of gold that somebody was fool enough to present to him, is of the kind of reports that are to be eagerly believed. It is like him. If we had been blindfolded and asked, "Who declined a golden throne?" we should have unhesitatingly replied, "The Pope!"

— The downy young person of doubtful, but probably female, gender, who writes to the Town Crier that she does not like him very well, is informed he does not like her very well, too. He esteems her a rather bad egg—a very foolish and impertinent egg, in fact. Pass out of our memory, young person.

— It is stated that the Empress Carlotta takes a milk bath every day. If that does not cure her, she is to be buttered twice a week.

The Overland Monthly for December.

Practical, logical, instructive and amusing, just what a magazine ought to be. This number opens with the first part of a very well-written article on the history of wine-making by Alfred Harrold, detailing the early difficulties of all sorts that beset the wine-grower. This is followed by a discussion on bribery in elections and whether we should make it, as in Great Britain, a penal offence. Next is a story called "Kirwan," by Laura L. White, and how a man blundered in New Jersey. There are many other good articles which we leave our readers to find out for themselves. Apropos of the Overland, a gentleman just returned from England told us that, straying into a bookseller's shop in London, he found some numbers of the magazine there, and opening one, lit upon an article referring to the history of a lady who was living in the next house to the one he was visiting at. Of course he presented her with it.

— The month of November was one of considerable activity in general merchandise, the volume of business transpiring large, and satisfactory to merchants in all leading departments of trade. Toward the close of the month, a notable movement in coal and iron took place, the natural result of short supplies and enhanced rates of freights to this coast, as well as high cost and overering rates in the ports of supply. This state of things is likely to continue into the new year; and the rise in values is not to be confined to the articles named, but extends to Chemicals and many other staple imports. The Coffee speculation that began in October has not yet terminated. The market upon this coast is sluggish, with very limited transactions. Importers, however, continue firm in their pretensions, and if fresh imports are not too much scattered, prices may be yet sustained.—Commercial Record.

Contributions to Our Schools.—The following letter was sent East Nov. 28th:

MAYOR'S OFFICE, SAN FRANCISCO, November 29th, 1871.
 Mr. J. L. PIERCE, Secretary of the Public Schools, Chicago. DEAR SIR: Enclosed please find a draft of Bank of California, No. 38,235, for thirty-one hundred and forty-four and twenty-eight one-hundredths dollars, gold coin, on Messrs. Lees & Weller, New York. This amount was collected by the superintendent, teachers and scholars of our public schools for the benefit of the teachers and scholars of Chicago who are suffering by the great fire.
 THOS. H. SELBY,
 Mayor of San Francisco.

— During the month of November, there were 709 gold deposits at the San Francisco Branch Mint, amounting to 98,810 ounces, and 189 silver deposits, amounting to 150,000 ounces. The coinage at the San Francisco Branch Mint for November was as follows: Gold, $1,550,000; Silver, $134,000; Total, $1,684,000.

— It is stated with some pride that "many noble women will meet at stated seasons during the next six months, to work for the homeless people of the Northwest." And many equally noble women, who do not happen to meet with them, will have good reason to regret the charitable event.

— The United Ancient Order of Druids have petitioned the Board of Supervisors for a burial lot in the new City Cemetery. Let it be granted to them upon the terms offered to settlers upon the public lands: it must be improved and permanently occupied by them.

— The honors recently paid to the memory of Ugo Foscolo have been the cause of the revival of one of his tragedies. [That is probably what the fellow died for. Deep old file!]

— The average rain-fall from the season of 1849-50 to that of 1870-71, twenty-two seasons, was 28.5 inches. Tennant's Record, just published.

— The surplus of wheat in Oregon, this season, is estimated at 75,000 tons, nearly all of which will find its way to Europe.

— Statistics drawn up in Paris show that during the late siege 70,000 horses were eaten by the people.

"Solid Silver."

Every generation shows a change in the Drama of a country, not always progressive, but ever variable. The history of English Drama is an evidence of this. We do not refer to the creations of Shakspeare, Sheridan or such like, which belong to all time, but of those productions which the state of society and the natural bent of the public call forth. Our forefathers enjoyed the splendid acting of the Kembles, Cooke, the elder Kean, Mrs. Siddons and Miss O'Neil in the higher branches of the profession, whilst Foote, Liston and the elder Matthews amused them with their broad comedy. Occasionally Addison's classical compositions, with his pure English, or Johnson's ponderous hexameters, were listened to without weariness, or Miss Inchbald's simple plays charmed an easily-pleased audience. A generation ago Sheridan Knowles inaugurated a new school of dramatic art, more natural, yet at the same time more animated than its predecessor, and consequently more appreciated by the then nascent matter-of-fact age. His works may properly be called plays. With the exception of Virginius, which was one of his earliest, they are not tragedies, for there is a lack of that sustained intensity of passion such, for example, as we meet with in Macbeth; nor are they comedies, for he did not aim at satirizing the vices or follies of the age. They are neither more nor less than dramatized novels, the incidents of which are drawn from every day emotions of love, anger, jealousy, pride or cupidity, but all touched with the hand of a master, at the same time with a kindly tone of humanity. Such plays are The Wife, The Love Chase, Love, etc. In this last, for example, how gradually does Sheridan Knowles exhibit the overmastering of the "Countess'" pride in her love for "Hoon." Then followed Bulwer's Lady of Lyons, of the same school (Richieu was written for Macready), and Marston's Noble Heart, a perfect specimen of the domestic drama. Talfourd's Ion, with its beautiful classical speeches and elegant English, yet all subordinate to the modern school, with many others kept the stage for fifteen or twenty years. Meanwhile Boucicault, who had begun well in his London Assurance, together with Tom Taylor, found out that it paid better and was easier, to translate the sensational French melodramas of the Porte St. Martin, replete with tableaux, where people die to slow music and the last scene is a mixture of dead villains, virtue rewarded and red fire, where there is always a comic man and a pert Abigail. The public took to this hot and strong foreign importation and the labors of the scenist and machinist were more regarded than the purity of the style or the morality of the plot. This increased till at length we must have real trains almost running over live people, real fires with real engines, in short, everything real but the spirit that craves such excitement. To this may be joined the allurements of the modern troupes of burlesque, all belonging to the same class of sensual excitement, and all evidencing an unhealthy, unreal condition of public taste.

In Solid Silver, Mr. Barnes has most happily revived the purer school of Sheridan Knowles. There is nothing intricate in the plot. The play is a simple story of modern life, well put together and artistically handled. "Paul Weir," the son of the late rector, is the Secretary of and secretly in love with "Bertha Huntingdon," the heiress of Huntingdon Towers. This young lady has a worthless cousin called "Captain Morris," who, after running through his own money, gets into the hands of the Jews and borrows all he can upon post obits as heir of "The Towers" after Miss Huntingdon, whom he represents as sickly and dying. He even commits forgery by indorsing another name than his own on some bills. Accompanied by "Sponge" Senior and Junior, the money lenders, he comes down to "The Towers," where the Jews, to their disgust, find the heiress to be in perfect health and likely to outlive them all. The only thing that remains is to marry her, in which desire he is favored by the terms of her father's will urging her to that, but not unless she is willing. "Paul Weir" is secretly loved by "Bertha," which her sprightly cousin "Kate Delaire" is not slow to discover. He is, of course, hated and bullied by "Captain Morris," who at a fête in honor of "Bertha's" birthday makes her an offer of marriage, which she declines. He retires, and "Paul Weir" comes in to take his leave, as he can no longer endure the pangs of love; she remonstrates, urging his duty to his mother, to himself, and finally, with tears, to herself. Thereupon he declares his passion and rushes away. Her weeping is disturbed by "Kate," who proposes a game of hide and seek for the children. "Bertha" goes to hide in an old tower, gets into a wide chimney, which closes with a panel, and she is immured. For two days and nights the household seeks her, "Captain Morris" begins to assume the actions of proprietor, gets knocked down by "Weir," who refuses to give up his secretarial keys, goes out into the garden to hide his shame, when a pigeon flutters by him; he catches it and finds a slip of paper tied to it, whereon is written by Miss "Huntingdon" that she is dying of hunger behind the panel in the old tower. For an instant the man's better nature prevails, and "Captain Morris" loudly calls for help. At this juncture, the elder "Sponge" comes in, insists upon payment, and threatens him with a criminal prosecution for forgery. That decides the matter, and the "Captain" lights a match and burns his cousin's missive. Meanwhile young "Sponge," who has become a changed man in consequence of his love for "Kate Delaire," and "Paul Weir" have been unceasing in their search for "Bertha." They suddenly come upon a small door in the tower, which they had overlooked; they listen and think that they hear a faint moan. It was not long ere their united strength wrenches the door from its fastenings; they rush up a staircase and return with the apparently lifeless body of Miss "Huntingdon," to be surrounded by the entire household, whom their cries have aroused. In the last act the heiress of "The Towers" has recovered. Need we say any more, except that she marries her deliverer, young "Sponge" marries "Kate," and "Captain Morris" levants for France?

Such is an outline of the plot, but there are most delicate fillings in. The character of "Bertha," a handsome, dashing girl, full of health and honest goodness, with her description of a ride across the country where her cousin doesn't follow her, is excellent. Her frank confidence in and love for all around her is in harmonious contrast with her pretty, saucy gad fly of a cousin "Kate." Young "Sponge" is the most original character in the whole piece. He comes in as a flashy, good natured, London snob, but is transformed by his love for "Kate." His inherent good heart is early shown in his conduct to the horsekeeper, whom he chaffs, but will no longer distress by smoking in the drawing-room. This old housekeeper is a perfect picture. Young "Sponge" counteracts all the machinations of his father and "Captain Morris" opens "Bertha's" eyes to that latter's real character; displays the greatest activity and perseverance in the search for the young lady, and by most adroit handling of the author gains the hearts of everybody. The "Captain," an ungrateful character to depict, although dissipated and utterly gone to the bad, is yet to outward appearance a gentleman, and the struggle between his good and evil genius, when the pigeon reveals the hiding place, is essentially dramatic in its character; the entreaty to old "Sponge" to leave him comes from the very anguish of despair, and is in entire harmony with the previous soliloquy where he curses the crimes and follies that had caused him to feel abject himself and despised by others. In this scene Mr. Barnes touches the highest range of tragic art. We would fain dilate on the quiet subdued character of "Paul's" mother, of the empty headed pride of the aristocratic "Lady de la Lande," and of many other capably drawn minor details. We should like to praise the beautiful scenery and good acting, but our aim has been solely to prove the superiority of Mr. Barnes' first play.

The Origin of the French Commune.

A remarkable paper was read the other evening before a French Club, by Mr. Gaston Verdier, on the above subject. Mr. Verdier was an eye witness of the events he describes, and without palliating the excesses of the Communists, yet we think sufficiently explains the errors and prejudices that created the Commune. The speaker began by remarking that the Commune of the 26th May had no resemblance whatever with that of the 18th March. The vote of the Plebisite having given absolute power to Napoleon, he declared war against Germany, and then it was that his subjects found themselves without soldiers, without commissariat and without leaders. It ended, as we all know, by the siege and capitulation of Paris. But in that Paris were the men who had fought most nobly and suffered the greatest privations in its defence, men who had looked death in the face by war, pestilence and famine, and these men were in the position of Hotspur after the field at Holmedon—

"When I was dry with rage and extreme toil,
Breathless and faint, leaning upon my sword,
Came there a certain lord."

A proclamation from Marseilles was posted on the 18th March, ordering the guns on the forts on the heights of Chaumont and Montmartre to be given up, and requesting good citizens to separate themselves from the evil ones, thereby obtaining all Paris, for there were only fifteen soldiers of the Garde Nationale at Montmartre, and seventeen at Chaumont, when the troops presented themselves to take possession of the guns, and no opposition was attempted. But the guns were not taken away nor was there any attempt to do so until too late. The murder of Generals Thomas and Lecompte caused the explosion. All this might have been prevented if, after the treaty of peace had been signed and the elections over, the National Assembly had met at Paris. The entire city prayed for it. Thiers advocated and advised it, but the Legitimist majority overruled this wise proceeding, and this mark of distrust still more wounded that Paris which so little merited the result. The whole is a sad history of error, injustice and revenge.

— A New Yorker allowed a pet spaniel to lick his lips, and died of hydrophobia four weeks afterward, says a varicacious journal. Hydrophobia is a disease peculiar to dogs, and if it may be communicated in that manner we do not know why hysteria, which is a disease peculiar to women, may not be communicated in a similar way. The doubt will at least justify some caution as to whom you suffer to kiss you. We would not wish, with our present light, to counsel total abstinence, but a wise promiscuous indulgence. For example, one need not take the unnecessary and non-compensatory risk of a salute from his mother or his own sister. That kind of thing is vanity, at best.

— Dr. Beard, in a recent work on "Eating and Drinking," asks: "Is it not a fact that brain-workers eat a better quality and larger quantity of food than mechanics and laborers?" Yes; they have to work their brains to get it. "Check" workers eat a better quality and larger quantity than either. "Check" in ours.

In Memoriam.

The oldest official of the public bureau of the United States Government passed to his last home December 4th. For nearly fifty years Major Thomas L. Smith had served his country faithfully, honorably, and with rare ability and intelligence that was bright unto the end. It was his lot to see all his companions and co-workers fall away from his side; his graceful pen had written many of their obituaries and done justice to their virtues, until at length he stood alone, and those who loved and honored him were but as saplings surrounding the old oak, for two generations separated them. No one remains to speak of the days when they were young together, and his history has become tradition. Major Smith was born in the County of Dinwiddie, State of Virginia, in the year 1787, when America was only thirteen years old. His ancestors were connected with the history of the country from its foundation, his father having been sent to France on a diplomatic mission, where he died. The subject of our notice was thereupon brought up by his venerable and distinguished uncle, Professor Granville B. Smith, at that time President of William and Mary College. In 1812 he was commissioned a Major in the regular army; resigning, he married an English lady, then in Philadelphia, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. He removed to New York, served in the Legislature of that State, was elected President of the City Bank, resigned upon the earnest, personal solicitation of his warm friend, General Jackson, to accept the position of Registrar of the U. S. Treasury, finally arriving at the post of First Auditor, which he retained until his death. Thus for a period longer than that usually allotted to man, has Major Smith pursued his career of active usefulness. He possessed literary tastes of a high order, having for many years been a constant contributor to the press, in prose as well as poetry. It is not long since we had the privilege of publishing some verses of his in our columns. We noticed then the nerve and vigor of the old man's handwriting, such as would shame many a young man of the present day. In manners Major Smith was most refined and cultivated, with a polished address that was remarked by all that had intercourse with him. He was the intimate friend of Gen. Scott, Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, Preston, and, in fact, his society was courted by the master spirits of this country for the last fifty years—all these had gone before him, leaving him as the last link that remained of the refinement, cultivation and polish of the old school. Major Smith was known throughout the length and breadth of the country, and his loss will be severely felt. He has left this earth full of honors, kindness, love and affection; he was a devoted husband, kind and affectionate father, whose memory will be ever cherished. Major Smith leaves a widow and several children, amongst whom are Mrs. T. H. Holt and Algernon Smith of this city.

Where Shall We Build Our Suburban Residences?

As California advances in wealth, as our mines pour out their treasure, as San Francisco increases its riches and grows in importance, as our merchants grow rich, the question becomes one of importance: Where shall our splendid mansions be constructed? Where? Away from the din of business and the bustle of traffic, near to trade in business hours, but far away in the country after all have "sunk the shop." To what quiet, charming country place can we go easiest, where the climate is delightful and the diurnal winds of San Francisco are tempered to gentle breezes, and the cold, harsh, sea storms, laden with sand and dirt, become zephyrs sweet, pure and balmy? San Mateo, Oakland and the Encinal of Alameda are all beautiful, but flat; all desirable, but costly; too much horse railroad and ferry boat; the lands are too valuable. There is no romance with sand and fogs even under the shade of Druid oaks; mosquitoes will bite for blood even on the shores of Lake Merritt; fogs settle in Menlo Park. Now, there is near San Francisco a land of pure delight—neglected, unknown, a terra incognita, and yet it is nearer San Francisco than any other of our country places. The ferry transit is the shortest across our Bay; the climate surpasses any spot in the vicinity of our city: beautiful valleys, romantic hills clad in ever-living green, stretching up to grand mountains, romantic glens and groves; splendid drives, with bay and ocean views, and this spot is the County of Marin, the most beautiful county in our State. Sausalito is the nearest approach to our city, and all the way along for fifty miles, embracing Reed's Valley, Corte Madeira, Ross Landing, the charming village of San Rafael, all the way to Petaluma. The land now occupied by farmers is of trifling value. We write of this country not in the interest of speculators, because speculation has not yet begun to monopolize the beautiful places. The town of Sausalito is yet but a hamlet. A thousand splendid sites for residences can be purchased at nominal figures. All the way along the road indicated small tracts for villa residences can be cheaply purchased, and in time it will be the most delightful and charming of all the rural districts near our city. The railroad will soon be constructed from Sacramento to San Francisco, terminating at Sausalito. Another narrow gauge road will soon be built from Sausalito to the redwood forests of Mendocino; a sharp ferry will cross the Golden Gate entrance in seventeen minutes, and by rail the citizen may, in a single hour, be whirled away to a solitude among hills and valleys, amid shady groves and running streams.

— Match-makers have it that a marriage will ere long be arranged between His Royal Highness Prince Arthur and a daughter of the Duke of Abercorn.

The Inflammability of London.

The danger of a general conflagration in London appears to be greater than in any other city, because in none other is there anything like the same amount of commerce of all kinds carried on within the same superficial area, and under conditions so unfavorable to due precaution. It would be easy for Social Science philosophers to suggest theoretical remedies, but it would be vain for practical men to ignore the difficulties in the way of their adoption. A classification of trades, and the rigorous restriction of particular goods to particular stores and particular lofts, would no doubt do a great deal. But is that possible? Then, as to warehouses for the storage of inflammable goods, if each separate block could be made to stand entirely detached, we should probably arrive at a minimum risk. But enough has been stated to show that such a precaution is out of the question. Buildings, the stock in which never could be entirely destroyed, might be constructed on the compartment system; but what chance have we of that? A partial attempt in that direction has been made by the introduction of metal doors under the Building Act, but at best these are only a slight security. Much may no doubt be, and is, done by keeping a close look-out. Happily, the Metropolitan Board of Works seems disposed to maintain an efficient Fire Brigade. The difficulty of concentrating the efforts of the entire staff of that force at a given spot in time to stop the spread of a fire which had once seized hold of a street of City warehouses is one which has not been lost sight of. The Board and Captain Shaw have been devoting much attention to the floating engines, and also to the thorough training of the men. Probably no such climbers can be found in any other city as the firemen of London. For some years past no man has been taken into the force who had not previously been a sailor; and it has been found that, with a shorter drill than any other class, sailors become the best firemen. The powerful and continuous stream of water poured upon a fire from one of the floating engines makes them extremely powerful auxiliaries in extinguishing a vast fire. We have four, and even the United States can boast of nothing like them. Recent experiments lead to the belief that they may be employed with advantage at even a very considerable distance from the river. The number of steam land engines has been steadily increasing, and at every station there are manuals, which are particularly useful where the distance to the fire is short. Lastly, telegraphic communication is perfect between all the stations; so that no fire can make any head without being encountered by at least a well-organized resistance. —London Times.

The Hawes Will.

The matter of the contestation of the will of Horace Hawes, after three weeks' patient investigation, brought the Jury before whom the cause was tried to the conclusion that he was of unsound mind, and of that class of the insane denominated monomaniacs. The verdict met public expectation and approval, quite as much because the lamented Horace was unutterably mean and cruel to his family, as because of general belief in any real mental disturbance in the old monster. The evidence was simply a shocking revelation of what human nature, in its worst aspects, unfettered by conscience and unrestrained by honor, may become. The Jury found him insane. This was charitable at least. They were the duly authorized triers of the issue, and we do not propose to quarrel with their conclusion. Such a man deserves neither remembrance nor monument now, or at the expiration of that hundred years when Hawes proposed to permit a grateful world to do him reverence. The cause of education needs no such tributes. No endowments based on social brutality, testamentary injustice, and a passion for earthly immortality, as unreasonable as disgusting, can ever draw to a university that generous public sympathy without which, as we understand Hawes' gifts, they are to be of no effect. Certainly this generation will do nothing to build up an institution whose grand object is to immortalize such a man, nor cover with the mists of time the villainous, miserly, cruel and egotistical old sinner. The Mont Eagle University foundation was always impracticable, and let it die. The Trustees have done their duty to the public, thoroughly and well. They will not meet its approval or have its assistance in protracting a war in which victory as Trustees would be a defeat of the native nobleness of heart and life which has characterized them, one and all, as men. Indeed, the whole case for the contestants, under the management of Mr. Barnes, has been characterized by the like nobleness of character. Nothing that was not absolutely necessary in a business and legal point of view was brought forward. The main fact to be proved was the mental incapacity of the testator, and that point once firmly established, there was no going back on disgusting details of domestic life, on tyranny, sordid life and imbecility. In his conduct of this case, Mr. Barnes has ennobled the character of the bar for dignity, learning, and that force of character which, while it insists on right, never does so with violence.

— The progress of intelligence in the editor of a literary weekly may be accurately measured by his "Answers to Correspondents." Every fact with which he has recently become acquainted is conscientiously therein set down, in reply to some inquiring action of his imagination. A small portion of the thing he does not know would be detected by a perusal of the inquiries he actually receives.

The Baby-Farmer's Lulaby.

This was the rhyme she droned
As she rocked in a rickety chair, [floor,
In a whitewashed room with a bare deal

With papered windows and wide-cracked door,

And ceiling as foul as the air:

"A spoonful of sleeping stuff

For hushing 'em when they cry:

There's little ones more than enough,
And if they don't live they'll die."

Four babies tucked in a crib,

Two asleep in a chair.

Three more crawling the planks about,

Two would be burnt but the fire is out,
And still there's a cradle to spare.

Some look weary and pale,

Some look meagre and thin;

Some seem hectic and fever-torn—

All had been better if never born; [skin.

Their sharp bones stare through the

For their mother's bosom—rag;

For its nestling softness—straw;

For the loving kisses that dimples rain—

A bottle, a spoon, the mixture, and pain:

A shake from a she-fiend's claw.

Ay, a spoon and cup on the hob,

A saucepan of gruel grey,

A phial on the shelf with its potion grim—

The little ones' prayers and their evening

hymn,

For the little time here they stay.

For often at morn and night,

From want of a mother's care

Grim death—no, gentle—with bony breast,

Hushes them off to a happier rest;

Their cradle a deal shell bare.

British Ale No Humbug.

It is gluttony, and not drunkenness, as we are assured in Mr. Bass' speech to the Derbyshire licensed victuallers, that is really the deadly foe of Englishmen. He maintains—upon the authority, as he tells us, of the Registrar General and of the "most eminent medical men in this country and elsewhere"—that the sufferings of mankind are mainly caused by over-eating, and not by over-drinking. "Twenty men suffer from excessive eating where only one suffers from excessive drinking;" and there are ten premature deaths and ten cases of sickness from over-eating to one death from over-drinking. It is not wonderful then that Mr. Bass should say that a licensed victualler's trade is not more harmful than a butcher's or a baker's. Indeed it would seem that the sale of meat and bread must need to be more carefully restricted than the sale of beer, though for the time he refrains from any proposal for its limitation. Good liquor is far more necessary than food for health and happiness; and Mr. Bass "individually would almost rather refrain from eating than from drinking." The best advice which he can give to men advancing in years is that "they should eat half the quantity to which they have been accustomed, and drink twice as much." Of course their beverage must be of the right kind, and they must not follow the example of those unhappy Scotchmen who do indeed drink far more than Englishmen, but who ruin their constitutions by "drinking the most injurious spirits, fire-water; not good honest ale." The sure way to enjoy a green old age is, it seems, to drink sound ale, and plenty of it. Ale is the great heal-all, and is to mankind in general all, and more than all, that Dibbin's sailors thought grog was to them when they sang—

"Grog is our starboard, our larboard,

Our mainmast, our mizen, our log;

On shore, or at sea, or when harbored,

The mariner's compass is grog."

Neither Mr. Bass nor the licensed victuallers, however, would countenance any abuse of liquor, if indeed so good a thing can be abused; for no class of men in existence can be more interested in sobriety than they are. The interest and the inclination of the licensed victuallers alike forbid them to allow drunkenness in their houses; and we may be sure of this upon the authority of Mr. Bass, who thinks he knows more about them than any man in England, "as he has spent a deal of time in their houses, although he never got drunk in one." But even if there be a little too much drunkenness now, the people will continue to improve year by year in temperance, as they have improved all through Mr. Bass's life, and "though they drink more will get drunk less." In short a good time is coming when England will be an earthly paradise, wherein there will be no drunkenness, but every other house will be an ale-house, with "Bass' Entire" on its signboard, and a red-faced landlord drawing beer for a set of hearty toppers while they sing—

"Head and foot, go bare;

Side and back, go cold;

But, belly, God send thee good ale enow,

Whether it be new or old."

— Dr. Wilkins, of Marysville, whose departure upon a tour of inspection of insane asylums we noticed some two years ago, has returned. The Doctor has traveled a great many thousands of miles, and has drawn his salary with commendable regularity. If he has gathered any valuable knowledge relative to the care of the insane we do not know; but he has returned just in time to see how the people have taken care of the lunatic who sent him. Perhaps he may get a hint from that.

The Decay of Japan Silk Eggs.

We have received Mr. Consul Robertson's report of his journey to investigate the causes of the growing deterioration in Japanese silk, and the best remedies for it. Mr. Robertson estimates the ground zone over at 222 miles. It was gratifying to find the willingness with which any remark on their industry was listened to by the natives; but it has been pretty well the experience of foreigners all over Japan that a good practical lesson in the way of diminished profits is the best way of appealing to the native common sense. It was satisfactory to learn that the attention of Japanese is drawn far more than formerly to care in the cultivation of the mulberry, and that instead, as they were wont to do, of exhausting the mulberry by using the one tree for thirty, forty, or even fifty years, the tree is now discarded after being only twenty years in use. The majority of the Japanese believe that the "saji" is beyond the skill of human treatment, and that unless the percentage in any one year is excessive, its presence in the worm is not of much moment. For the production of one card of eggs, 80 "me" (Japanese weight) of cocoons are required, giving in numbers 260 moths male and female. 160 "me" go to the catty, the catty being equal to 1 lb. 10s. avoirdupois. It would seem that the cultivation of the mulberry in Japan has increased 25 per cent. since the Treaties of 1859, which is interesting to note as showing how foreign intercourse has stimulated the silk trade. The advantage of machinery over hand labor for reeling did not impress them very strongly. It seems that two hanks—the one reeled by hand, the other by machinery—had already been tested in Yokohama; and although that reeled by machinery was found to have more nerve, it was, on the whole, inferior to that reeled by hand. But this is easily accounted for in that the machinery in use at Maebashi is of the crudest kind, while the hank reeled off by hand was probably the work of the most skillful reelers procurable. Mr. Robertson received the greatest courtesy and kindness from the Japanese officials, and the result of his inquiries is that the gradual deterioration of silk in Japan that has now been going on for some time past is mainly attributable to the almost unlimited export of annual seed. —London and China Express.

— At a late meeting of the Medical Society of London, Dr. Richardson read a paper on the possibility of destroying animals intended for human food, without inflicting pain. No such thing is desirable; the law has so tied our hands with regard to one another that it is a blessed happiness to murder domestic animals. If men were not allowed to vent their brutality by braining bees, and ripping open the throats of pigs, no woman would be safe a moment, and the fault of mangling babes would be even more common than it is. A kind of melancholy relief might be found in impaling worms upon fish-hooks, but there are not enough fish in the sea to supply the multitudes who would be driven to angling. Besides, we should not be secure in even that temperate atrocity; science would insist upon asphyxiating the worms.

— The report of a committee of the General Association of the Congregational Church says: "Of the churches whose names still appear in our statistical table, a few have only a name to live. Respecting some of them it is reported that they cannot be found. Saddest of all it is, when a church of Jesus Christ must pass away, with not a friend to give it decent burial." It is very mournful; it makes one feel like stealing a pocket handkerchief in which to weep. Let us comfort ourselves with the reflection that the nomadic Christians of the mining towns may lose their organization, but not that heavenly essence, that divine spark—faith. With faith, and a sack of flour, the devout miner will manage to worry along somehow, if his baking powders are good. O, faith! O, love! O, Christian charity! O, sack of flour! O, prayer and pancakes!

— The Advocate says: "Brother Hu Sing Me" (a Chinaman, mind you), "is a pious, earnest, Christian gentleman." An intelligent bull-pup, owned by another Christian gentleman, has had the advantage of an occasional bite at Brother Hu Sing Me's shins, and is of the opinion that the brother is a very good fellow. When we have the united testimony of two such respectable authorities, it is wicked to doubt. Nevertheless, we regard this boasted Christian gentleman as extremely yellow in complexion; and to this opinion we mean to stick. He are not to be deceived; all the blood of the Lamb can never wash a Chinaman white. Talk not to us of "earnestness" and "piety!" We're a Christian ourselves. Of the Eight-Hour kind, 'egad! What ho! there. A club and a brickbat for this Christian gentleman with a pigtail!

— A man representing himself to be Andrew Johnson—whom some of our readers, but none of our posterity, will remember was once President of the United States—has been sentenced to a month's imprisonment in Italy. The sentence seems very unjust; it was clearly shown he was not Andrew Johnson.

An Ingenious Robbery.

A curious anecdote was told to my father by the ordinary of Newgate about Fauntleroy. On the morning of the execution, he went into the cell to pray with him, and administer all the spiritual comfort his dreadful position demanded. To his amazement, he found Fauntleroy carefully airing his shirt! I think it was not long before this celebrated trial that my father was engaged in an extraordinary one for a robbery in the shop of one of our most eminent jewelers. Two ladies came in with a little girl from a very elegant carriage, and desired to see some valuable jewelry for a present. They remained two hours at least, and at last fixed on some diamond ornaments, costing £100, for which they paid. The men in the shop had been very attentive, and shown them a great many very costly and beautiful ornaments, among the rest a very large emerald set in five diamonds as a brooch. When they had finished, the shopman said—"I beg your pardon, ladies, but you did not return that brooch that you were looking at." They declared they had, and he was as positive it never crossed the counter on its return. Another man, who was near, said he was sure it had not been returned. The ladies got very indignant, and said they would not lie under such an imputation, and insisted upon being searched. Sir Richard Birnie, the chief magistrate in those days, was applied to, and sent as quickly as possible female searchers, who made, in a bedroom upstairs, a most thorough examination, and certified that none of the three had the brooch. The master and shopmen apologized, but the brooch was gone. The ladies gave their address at a very good house in the fashionable part of London. Of course, however, a watch was kept on this house by the police, and not very long after all the inmates decamped, having robbed and swindled in many directions. Not long after, the very fine emerald was traced to Holland, and to these very people. They were tried at the Old Bailey, and found guilty, and I believe, transported for life. While they lay in prison, they were urged to tell how they committed the robbery. While they were making their purchases, a beggar woman with a baby came to the door of the shop, and was very clamorous for a "small trifle to save her and her child from starving." At last, one of the ladies said to the little girl, "There, give her sixpence, and tell her to go away." The sixpence was the emerald brooch, the beggar an accomplice, and a man in waiting went off to Holland before the ladies had even been searched. It was very clever, yet ill-judged, to take so extraordinary a stone, as it was so easily traced. The value was very large; I forget how much; but I am sure more than £3,000. The people in the shop only remembered the beggar when the confession was made; the circumstance had made no impression.—Recollections of John Adolphus, Barrister at Law.

A Truthful Dream.

I remember my father's uneasiness when Greenacre was brought up day after day before the magistrate, and nothing could go on towards his committal, the head of the wretched victim, Hannah Brown, not having been found. Pieces of cut up flesh could not be identified, and all that could be done was to adjourn over and over in very faint hope. Circumstances were strongly against the prisoner, but the law would not permit a trial unless the body could be identified. A most wonderful circumstance occurred at last, and settled the matter. Hannah Brown had lodged some months before at a little shop in Good street, Tottenham Court Road, and the very night of her murder she called to take leave of the people there, saying she was going next day to be married. They soon after, of course, heard of her murder. The woman of the shop said one morning to her husband, "I have now dreamt four nights of a place where I know we should find Hannah Brown's head, and if you still refuse to go there with me, I am determined to hire a man to dig there, and I shall find it." At last she prevailed on her husband, and took him a long way off (I think in the Bayswater direction), where they were making foundations for houses—a large open space. She looked about, and at last said, "Dig there." He did so, and found the head in a sack. This, of course, was all important, and was still further corroborated in this way. A gentleman, hearing where the head was found, applied to the magistrate, saying he traveled in an omnibus with a man who had something in a sack he was very careful of; he looked at him very particularly, and should know him. He thought it a most suspicious circumstance that on getting out he ran across that open place I have described, and had a lighted lantern. An order was given for thirty prisoners to be shown to this gentleman, who instantly fixed on Greenacre. He was tried and executed, as every one knows. The head was quite perfect, and the features had not been mangled in the least. He had imagined, by burying the head, he should render discovery impossible, and so it would have been, and he must have been discharged, but for this wonderful interposition of Providence.

—The Times says that in London wife-beating is greatly on the increase. It is not clear if this means that more wives are beaten, or that the same ones are beaten more frequently and harder. There is nothing so desirable as precision in journalism and wife-beating. By the way, what is the difference between wife-beating and carpet-beating? There isn't much difference, apparently, except that the latter is commonly an unprovoked and unjustifiable assault.

Court Chat.

— SIR C. DILKE ON THE ROYAL HOUSEHOLD.—At Newcastle, on November 6, Sir C. W. Dilke, M.P. for Chelsea, delivered a lecture to a crowded audience on "Representation and Royalty." After referring to the autumn maneuvers, the hon. baronet went on to say that, speaking roughly, the positive and direct cost of Royalty to this country is about a million a year. It is worth remembering (he continued) that the Royal family are the only persons in the kingdom who pay no taxes; and even those annuities which we have lately granted are expressly freed from all taxes, assessments, and charges. It is strange with regard to the Queen's income that this should be the case, seeing that Sir Robert Peel stated to the House of Commons, when about to introduce the Income Tax Bill in 1842, that Her Majesty, "prompted by those feelings of deep and affectionate interest in the welfare of her people which she has ever manifested, stated to him that if Parliament should subject all incomes to a certain charge, it was her determination that her own income should be subjected to a similar burden." I have reason to believe that all these enormous sums of money are not well spent, and it is almost worth a few minutes' time to see in what kind of manner they do contrive to disappear. The salaries in the Royal household, which amounts to £131,000 a year, includes a vast number of totally useless officials. (Laughter.) Nothing is more singular than the constitution of the medical department. You would hardly credit the number of medical gentlemen who are required for the service of the household, but I am aware that some of them are unpaid. There are three physicians in ordinary, three physicians extraordinary, one surgeon-extraordinary, two sergeant-surgeons, three surgeons extraordinary, one physician of the household, one surgeon of the household, one surgeon-apothecary, two chemists of the establishment in ordinary, one surgeon-oculist, one surgeon-dentist in ordinary, and one other physician or twenty-one in all—(laughter)—while the Prince of Wales has for his special benefit three honorary physicians, two physicians in ordinary, two surgeons in ordinary, one surgeon extraordinary—(laughter)—one chemist in ordinary, or eleven more—(loud laughter)—making thirty-two doctors in one family. (Laughter and applause.) I should be almost afraid of tiring anybody who listened to me while I went over the list of strange offices of which the household is made up—lord high almoner, sub-almoner, hereditary grand almoner, master of the buck-hounds, clerk of the check, clerk of the closet, exons in waiting, and last, but not least, the hereditary grand falconer, the Duke of St. Albans—(laughter)—who might, perhaps, with advantage, if he is to retain his salary of £1,500 a year, be created hereditary grand pigeon-shooter in ordinary. (Loud laughter.) If we turn to the lord steward's department, we come at once upon a mysterious board of green cloth, as it is called, at the head of which are the lord steward, the treasurer, the comptroller of the household, and the master of the household, with a perfect army of secretaries and clerks, and with special secretaries, with special offices, and with special salaries in each of those sections of the department. (Laughter.) In the kitchen department we have a chief cook and four master cooks, receiving salaries of between £2,000 and £3,000 a year between the five; and a host of confederates, some of whom have duties that I cannot even guess at—such, for instance, as the two "Green Office" men. (Roars of laughter.) There are whole departments, the duties of which cannot be very considerable, one would think, or, at all events, not considerable enough to warrant their being made into departments of the household—for instance, the confectionery department and the ewer department, while the duty of table decking employs no less than five persons—(laughter)—who have salaries of between £500 and £600 a year in all. (Hisses.) Now I have said already that a great deal of this expenditure brings no benefit in any shape to members of the Royal family, and that it is largely an expenditure upon mere sinecures; but at the same time the expenditure could be curtailed. No one can doubt that the Queen might abolish these offices if she chose, and that if, as I believe, she has no right to abolish them and take over the consequent savings to her own use. Parliamentary powers for the abolition of the offices—taking the saving to the public—would gladly be given to the Treasury and the Crown.

— Sir William Jenner writes to the British Medical Journal respecting Her Majesty's recent illness:—A statement having been widely circulated to the effect that the Queen's recent illness was the result of re-vaccination, I trust you will, by inserting this letter, permit me to give the most unqualified contradiction to the report. There is not a shadow of foundation for it in facts. Her Majesty's recent illness did not commence till many months after the re-vaccination. There was no connection, direct or indirect, between the two. I should not have contradicted so foundationless a statement had I not heard that, in consequence of the positive terms in which the assertion is made, it has received a certain amount of credence, and is so causing harm to the public health.

— Florence Cowper, who styled herself "The Hon.," has been tried at the Middlesex sessions for obtaining goods by false pretences. On the first indictment the jury found the prisoner guilty, and the other indictments were not gone into. Mr. Harris said the prisoner was a notorious swindler, and had got largely into tradesmen's debt and never paid them. The prisoner said she had been presented at Court, and all her debts had been paid by the trustees of Mr. Baylis, her late husband, who was worth £20,000. She was sentenced to penal servitude for five years.

— The Emperor of Germany has invested the Queen of the Belgians with the Order of Merit for Females.

— M. Léon Say, the Prefect of the Seine, gave a grand dinner to the Council-General of the department on November 7th. In proposing the health of the President of the Republic, he expressed his gratification at the good feeling existing among the members of the Council, and said that it afforded the best of guarantees for the administration of the business of the department. M. Léon Say then referred to M. Thiers as a man above all parties, the representative at once of society, the Republic, and order.

— M. Thiers paid a visit lately, accompanied by M. Baragnay d'Hilliers, to the foundry where the restoration of the injured bronze of the column of the Place Vendôme is being carried on. All the restorations have been completed, and the men are now engaged in the preparation of a tablet to commemorate the restoration of the column, which, it is said, will be completed in the course of next March. The statue of Napoleon I. is to be restored to the summit.

— The munificence of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts has again been displayed by the gratuitous transfer of Columbia Market to the Corporation of the City of London, being the most splendid gift ever made by a private individual. The instances are numerous in which those who have amassed property have signalized themselves by some single act of generosity, but the Baroness Burdett-Coutts has made benevolence the business of her life.

— The bungling endowment of the Bishopric of British Columbia, and the stupid acts emanating from missionaries sent out by Baroness Burdett-Coutts to Victoria (the £500 paid to the drunken missionary to marry the squaw, and leave the colony with her, is in no way to be made chargeable to the good intentions of the Lord Bishops), does not in the slightest degree affect her benignant and charitable characteristics.

— The illumination of the great tower at the Granville Hotel, which took place recently, was distinctly visible at Ostend, Dunkirk, and Calais, on the south; also Southend on the Essex coast. The same is reported from smacks that were fishing in the North Sea eighty miles from land. From ships in the Gulf stream and Downs the effect was magnificent.

— The thirtieth anniversary of the birthday of the Prince of Wales was celebrated Nov. 9th with the usual demonstrations of loyalty. The Royal standard was hoisted at the several garrisons and Government establishments, and many of the Westend tradesmen exhibited appropriate illuminations.

— A monument erected in Vienna to the memory of the Emperor Maximilian, of Mexico, was solemnly unveiled on Nov. 7th, in the presence of the Emperor Francis Joseph, the Archdukes, and the Ministers.

Special Brevities.

— An important attempt towards a solution of the question, "What is the use of our cathedrals?" is being made in London. St. Paul's was, on November 7th, thrown open for a series of lectures to young men, preceded by a short religious service. Canon Gregory, the first lecturer, took as his subject the question, "Are we better than our fathers?"—Canon Liddon will succeed.

— The Perthshire Advertiser extracts the following from a visitor's book "in a well-known locality in the Highlands:"

Glen Urquhart is a glorious glen

Where deer and grouse have not supplanted men.—JOHN BRIGHT.

And immediately below—

Glen Urquhart is a glorious glen

Where mules and shoddy have not stunted men.—SHIRLEY BROOKS.

— The Spanish Minister of War has issued a decree which makes promotion by seniority the general rule in the army. He has also declared his intention to enforce the prohibition of all collective presentations or demonstrations made by officers in favor of their superiors.

— The railway between Asnières and Dijon, which will form a direct line between Calais and Marseilles, will shortly be begun. This will enable travelers to pass from the shores of the Channel to those of the Mediterranean in eighteen hours.

— The trade in Circassian girls (says the Levant Herald) is carried on with a perseverance worthy of a better cause, but it is only just to the authorities to state that they appear to be making a steady effort to put a stop to it.

— A Versailles telegram states that the Government is preparing the Budget, and it is expected that the total amount of expenditure will, with the interest payable on the new debt, reach 2,800,000,000 francs.

— Captain Burton, the African traveler, is bringing home from Palmyra a collection of skulls, and the skeleton of a man eleven feet high, which is supposed to be one of the giants of Bashan, possibly Og.

— The tramways between Edinburgh and Leith were opened for passenger traffic on November 6. Ten cars were put on the line, and the number of passengers conveyed was about 12,000.

— Berlin has, at present, nine hundred thousand inhabitants, four thousand lager-beer saloons and seventeen daily newspapers.

— The British Medical Journal says there is now exhibiting in medical circles in Vienna a remarkable instance of tattooing of the whole body. According to his own account, the man, a Greek by birth, had been a pirate, and had also carried on brigandage on the Continent. Seven years ago, he and five companions were taken prisoners by one of the wild tribes of Asia. Three of them were put to death; but this man, with two others, was preserved alive and literally tattooed over the entire body. The operation lasted two months, and was performed by six men, who each day operated on different parts of the body. The proceeding caused horrible pain; and his two companions died under the treatment. His body is covered from head to foot with delineations of men, animals and fabulous things. The coloring material used for the figures appears to be indigo, the ground, especially on the chest and abdomen, being vermilion; here and there, about a line's breadth of the normal color of the skin can be seen. The hands and the soles of the feet are colored red, but have no figures. On the face and neck are inscriptions in characters resembling Arabic. The skin has the general appearance, to the sight and touch, of bluish-grey velvet. He attends the General Hospital in Vienna; and Professor Hebra has had him photographed in various attitudes.

— The petition given below was read by Dr. A. Wood to the General Council of the University of Edinburgh on October 27th. It was signed by 9,127 women of Scotland, all above the age of sixteen. The signatures comprise names from every class of society, including peeresses on the one hand, and women barely able to write their names on the other: "To the General Council of the University of Edinburgh,—gentlemen: It being often said that women have no desire for the medical services of their own sex, and take no interest in the struggle for professional education in which some women are now engaged, we, the undersigned, desire to record our emphatic protest against those statements, and to express our earnest hope that it may soon be possible for those of us who desire it to consult thoroughly educated physicians of our own sex. We venture further to thank you, and the University of which you are members, for the foremost part which Edinburgh has already taken in providing for the instruction of women in medicine, and to entreat you to carry forward your good work and complete it, by making such regulations and arrangements as shall afford to women the means of obtaining a complete medical education, and the usual medical degree at the hands of your time-honored University."

— At a meeting of cotton manufacturers at Blackburn, England, at which thirty-four firms, having 19,000 looms, were represented, thirty-one of these firms, representing 17,000 looms, resolved that they would commence running forty hours per week in lieu of fifty-seven, this arrangement to continue for one month. It is expected that, as the consumption of yarn will be reduced by this move 750,000 lbs. per month, cotton yarn will fall in price, and thus manufacturers, now working at a loss, will again be able to make a profit.

— The English Mechanic remarks: As the positive current of the electric battery passes from zinc to copper, so the positive current of the vital power (the will) passes from the brain of the magnetizer to that of the magnetized, removing the vital power of the latter to the solar plexus or negative pole; the current then re-passes to the positive pole of the magnetizer, where it reaches his thoughts and sensations, which thus become known to the clairvoyant or the patient.

— Gas will shortly be made in Yokohama, and in part of the city of Yeddo. The contract for the construction of the works has been negotiated through the medium of Messrs. Miller Brothers, Prince's Square, Glasgow, and has been entrusted by them to Messrs. Robert Laidlaw & Son, Glasgow. The first portion of the works, comprising about one-fourth of the entire undertaking, is in course of shipment by Messrs. Miller Brothers, per steamer from the Clyde.

— Newspapers are the strongest of financial enterprises when well managed and liberally conducted. Mr. James Grant, in his new book on the "Newspaper Press of London," expresses the belief that the profits of the London Times are £460,000 per annum. Mr. Grant edited the Morning Advertiser when Lord Brougham and Sir David Brewster wrote for it, and Lord Palmerston, unofficially of course, furnished editorials, and may be considered good authority.

— A half-worked monolith has recently been discovered in the grounds of the Russian pilgrims' monastery outside the walls of Jerusalem. It is believed to be a column intended for the decoration of the ancient Temple of Solomon; but that, as the column split while it was being worked, it was left unfinished, the lower part of it remaining in a rough, unheven state. It is 59 feet in length and about 6 feet in diameter.

— It appears from a report presented to the Swiss Statistical Society at the congress recently held at Basle, that Switzerland can boast of 25 public libraries, containing altogether 920,520 volumes; and not fewer than 1,629 other libraries, containing 687,534 volumes. The most extensive libraries are those of Zurich, which contains 100,000 volumes; of Basle, which has 94,000; and of Lucerne, with 80,000.

— The Qui Vire (the French Internationalist organ in London) expresses the following opinion of Mr. Gladstone's speech: "Mr. Gladstone rivals M. Thiers in the art of amusing a people and feeding it on words instead of facts. Never did a man better succeed in saying nothing while speaking for two hours. The rhetoric of the Premier may, in short, be summed up in one word: Wait."

— According to the last census, Liverpool, with its suburbs, has a population of 488,000, and Glasgow, with its suburbs, 560,000.

Criticism.

A little bird, whose heart was full of song,
Perched on a bough and poured his notes along,
The summer air, so sweet, that Zephyr staid
Awhile to listen, passive as a maid;
And lo, a moping owl, whose cell was near,
Forgot his reverie, and deigned to hear;
But wishing to be thought more wise than pleased,
His load of learning thus he lightly eased;
"Think not, vain singer, that your song is new;
Three thousand years ago, in Greece, there flew
And sang a bird, the counterpart of you!
And we who spend our hours in classic toil,
And burrow deep in learning's musty soil,
Know all about that ancient, borrowed strain;
So, sing new songs, or never sing again!"
The simple singer, innocent of art,
Who only knew his song came from the heart,
Made no reply, but hushed his modest note
And flew, to sing from wisdom more remote;
While Zephyr, swelling to a tempest howl,
At loss of song, smote the pedantic owl.

Leaves from a Lady's Diary.

Dec. 1.—I don't know why it is that I always feel sad when the last month of the year arrives. I can understand one's being gloomy at one's birthday after a certain age, like Mrs. M——, who won't have hers celebrated now by any of her relations. Here, on the first of December, I am low-spirited, and on the first of January, a month later, I shall be bright and gay. Went out on a provident shopping, buying Christmas presents before the hurry skurry of the last day. There is a certain age of children which is the most difficult to choose for. A girl is delighted with a doll even up to seven, and with picture books to nine, but from ten to twelve it is very hard to select for them. Jewelry, of course, would enchant, but that I look upon as mischievous. Girls between those ages ought to go to a nunnery.

Dec. 3.—Went to church with Emily and young H——, who has just come back from England. He says that there is more quiet devotion in the old country, but that the service is better performed as to music and outward sign here. He is much improved both in manners and appearance since he went away, indeed, would be striking anywhere. One remark he made impressed me: He said that the English, whose whole strength and wealth and power of vitality lie in their commerce, look down upon trade with shame, and that the moment the son of a Manchester man can (to use his own words) "cut the shop" he does so, and H—— says he often cuts his father as well.

Dec. 4.—How vanity prevails even in the family circle. Boys always like to walk out with their pretty sisters, who is generally a tyrant at home; and here to-day I found Rosina B—— gloating over a photograph of her good-looking, good-for-nothing, waxed-mustached, dark-eyed, low-browed brother, who has no more brains than he can brush out with his hair-brush, whilst her great, short-sighted, round-shouldered, pale brother, who will one day be famous, is snubbed by them all. Perhaps it is better for him; perhaps had his early life been warmed by affection he would have been less strong minded but more tender hearted. However, the tender heart comes at length, though later to the strong mind. Went with the crowd to see Solid Silver. The majority went to display their own plate, and to follow the stream of popularity. For Barnes is the popular man of the day. Everybody was disposed to applaud and be pleased, for men are not jealous of men as women are of one another; besides, if another man is the favorite, men will not, nor will they be allowed to, show their jealousy. Young H——, who sat by me the greater part of the evening, remarked that the play would take better in London than San Francisco. I am getting quite fond of H——; he never goes out to drink or smoke between the acts, as he said: "What I do after the theater is my business; at present my business is your service."

— "It was this paper more than all other State influences combined, that set the Central Pacific Railroad Company in motion, and secured for their work the State and county aids to start them." The above is from the Sacramento Union. Lest it should be regarded as a grim and ghastly joke, we hasten to explain that the opinions of January, 1869, are not necessarily the opinions of December, 1871. There is such a thing as a change of heart. You remember the penitent thief. And the reformed drunkard. And the little boy who swore off eating hot potatoes. Peter, it will be recollected, denied his master, and Judas got sick of the disciple business when he found there was no money in it. We're worms—that is what we are!

— Receipts from Internal Revenue for the year ending June 30th, 1871, $144,101,176. Estimated receipts for the year ending June 30th, 1872, $125,000,000.

Money and Commerce.

He that has money commands the service of men; he that has not, must be thankful for whatever he gets. Consequently, to be poor is to be weak, to be rich is to be strong.

—The jobbing business of this coast for the month of November was up to the full average, and we enter December well satisfied with the aggregate of the year's business. Our stocks of general merchandise are light, unusually so for the season, and with the increased and growing consumptive requirements of the Pacific slope we shall need enlarged imports of Staple Goods for the future. In fact, the shortness of supplies of certain articles is beginning to create uneasiness in certain quarters, for fear manufacturing establishments will have to stop for a season. Among the articles now in short supply we may enumerate Chemicals in variety, Coals of all sorts, Pig Iron, Naval Stores, Rice, etc. As for Coffee, we have sufficient to last until the appearance of the new crop in February and March. Of Sugars, the stock of both raws and refined is exceedingly light, less than for years past. Our importers are entirely bare of stocks, the only exception being perhaps 1,000 packages of Hawaiian Sugars, now being worked off. At the same time, our two leading Sugar Refineries are now beginning to clean up, preparatory to the closing accounts for the year; and, in consequence, are now using but light supplies, particularly as they are looking forward to increased competition next year by the resumption of the Bay Refinery, now idle two years, and the Golden State Refinery, idle one year. It is supposed that in 1872 there will be four refining companies in operation against two in 1871, thus rendering competition more lively, and reduce profits not a little. Besides, it is pretty generally known that there are 1,600 bbls Eastern Crushed Sugar now en route here, besides considerable Golden Syrup from Boston, to arrive here in January; and, judging from the past policy of our local refiners, we are prepared to see a cutting down of prices when these goods appear upon the market, and they are now fully due at this port.

On the 1st of December we had in warehouse a stock of Rice of 50,000 mats, of which 11,000 were Siam. This small stock is less than 60 days' consumption, our monthly consumption being placed at 45,000 bags. This unexpected exhibit has strengthened Rice holders materially, and induced them to advance prices somewhat.

Less than 60 days ago, No. 1 Scotch Pig Iron was offered freely in this market at $32 50 per ton, without finding buyers; and it was not until the price had steadily risen to $38 50 that operators had nerve enough to purchase it; but once taken hold of, the whole stock was speedily controlled, and the price advanced to $50 50, with sales—purchasers more ready now to pay $50 than $32 50 in October; and why? Because of the increased consumption of the Foundries and the knowledge that we had consumed more Iron the last four months than we had previously used in a twelvemonth.

The Coffee speculation has not been altogether successful thus far, but it is believed by some that prices can be kept up. It is unfortunate that we could not have been allowed to give St. Louis buyers another 5,000 bags at 19c before blocking up the trade entirely, but we learn wisdom as we grow older.

In regard to Coal we have no stock of any description in first hands, depending almost entirely upon Pacific coast mines for the supply of our wants.

We think it will be found at the close of 1871 that our Commercial interests for the year have been exceedingly prosperous, notwithstanding a short wheat crop. The high prices realized for the half crop harvested, the handsome prices realized for our large wool clip, and the highly remunerative prices obtained for our Wines, Brandies, Hops, Fruits and lesser crops have all contributed to the general results. Our Lumber and Coal interests have also been greatly developed, and our Mines have yielded liberally of the precious metals. Altogether, we have prospered exceedingly.

—By the arrival of the Moses Taylor, from Honolulu, we receive Australian advices to a late date. The commercial news from the Colonies is not important, their markets not at present offering any features of especial interest to our people, excepting in that of Coal, Wool, and Tallow. Prices of the former are quite stationary, while the Wool market had scarcely opened. We are informed that three or four vessels had been secured to load Wools for New York and Boston. The steamer brought but 64 bales Wool and 679 pkgs Tallow, the latter ordered expressly for the Mission Candle Factory. The steamer also brought from the Colonies 560 bxs Lemons.

—There continues to be a demand for import of Wines in bulk. French Claretts are firmly held. Champagnes move off slowly. The demand for Native continues, but likely to be checked for a time by the interruption of communication during the winter months. Sales for the week include 250 cs Landsberger's Sparkling; also, 500 galls Port and Angelica Wines, at current rates. At auction, on the 24th November, 184 cases Chs. Farre's Champagne, pts and qts, sold at $5.12 1/2 per case, in bond; and on the 4th inst., 234 baskets DeLossy's do, qts and pts, sold in bond, for account of underwriters, at $3.

—Our present supply of Bullion is rather light; but the rains will soon enable miners to largely increase the volume. The treasure shipments for the past week have been unusually large, especially to China and Japan, owing probably to the heavy importations of teas and silks on Eastern and domestic accounts. We have sent off, in the period specified, $771,210.86, without including the large sums forwarded through the mails.

The Rothschilds.

Money-making was the one pursuit and sole enjoyment of Nathan's life. When Louis Spohr, the great German musician, called on him in the Summer of 1830 with a letter of introduction from his brother Amschel, of Frankfort, he said to him, "I understand nothing of music. This"—patting his pocket, and rattling the loose coins therein—"this is my music, which we understand on 'Change.'" It was in the scramblings and fightings, the plots and tricks of money-making, not at all in the spending, and not much in the hoarding of it, that his soul delighted. "I hope," said a dinner companion on one occasion, "I hope that your children are not too fond of money and business, to the exclusion of more important things. I am sure you would not wish that." "I am sure I would wish that," replied Nathan; "I wish them to give up mind and body, heart and soul, to business. This is the way to be happy. It requires a deal of caution to make a great fortune, and, when you have got it, it requires ten times as much wit to keep it." Hence when two eminent clergymen, who took a warm interest in the Jews, called upon him with a view to induce him to aid in their restoration to Palestine, as his great wealth, it was thought, might influence the Sultan, Nathan declined, upon the all potent plea that "London was his Palestine, and that he could not further such an object in any way." On another occasion a German Prince visiting London brought letters of credit to the house of Rothschild. He was shown into the private room of the famous counting house in St. Swithin's Lane, where Nathan sat absorbed with a heap of papers before him. The name being announced, Rothschild nodded, offered his visitor a chair, and then went on with the work before him. For this treatment the Prince, who expected that everything should give way to one of his rank and dignity, was not prepared. Standing a minute or two, he exclaimed, "Did you not hear, sir, who I am?"—repeating his title at full length. "Oh, very well," exclaimed Nathan, with sly humor, "take two chairs, then." At another time two strangers were admitted into the same private room. They were tall foreigners, with beards and mustaches, such as were unknown in the city before the beard mania set in so powerfully as it has done of late, and Nathan was frightened at their appearance. He put his own interpretation upon the excited movements with which they fumbled about in their pockets; and, before the expected pistols could be produced, he had thrown a great ledger in the direction of their heads, and brought in a bevy of clerks by his loud cries of "Murder!" The strangers were pinioned, and then, after long questionings and explanations, it appeared that they were wealthy bankers from the Continent, who, nervous in the presence of a banker so much more wealthy than themselves, had found some difficulty in producing the letters of introduction with which they were armed. A terrible anecdote of another sort is recorded of Nathan's son, the present head of the London house, and M. P. for the city. We all recollect the persistent way in which the electors returned him to Parliament for years before the Legislature threw open its doors to the long-despised Jew. At his first election, when on the hustings, he boasted that he stood there as the free choice of the people. "So stood Barabbas!" deliberately exclaimed a deep, stern voice from the crowd—a sarcasm which, for its cruel vindictiveness, perhaps stands without a parallel. The same intense spirit of money-making appears to have been equally the mania of all the Rothschilds. Of James, the youngest son of Meyer, and head of the Paris house, who once entertained Napoleon III. in such an imperial manner at his Chateau Ferriere, and who died in 1868, leaving, according to public rumor, the colossal fortune of £44,800,000, it is related, as a proof of the strength of the ruling passion within him, that, foreseeing his death would cause a great fall in the shares of the Lombard Company, of which he was the President and chief support, he speculated largely for the fall just before he died, by which means the immense profits accruing therefrom went to the benefit of his heirs.—Gentleman's Magazine.

— We have discovered a species of animals in the foothills of this State—a kind of rat, apparently—which triumphantly establishes the soundness of Mr. Darwin's theory of natural selection. Early investigators—the Digger Indians, who used to trap these creatures—have recorded the fact that the females were far less hardy and robust than the males, and great numbers perished of cold every Winter. As these people ate the corpses, they may be presumed to have known what they were talking about. Mr. Darwin's discovery of that inestimable principle, the "survival of the fittest," enabled these males to weather the severest Winters; while the females froze to death even more numerous than before the discovery. Afterward, the promulgation of the principle of the "hereditary transmission of qualities"—or rather its elaborate explanation by Mr. Herbert Spencer—resulted in a great preponderance of masculine births over feminine; for, of course, a male will beget males, and females will beget females. There being already more males than females, more males than females were begotten. These two scientific causes—the survival of the fittest and the hereditary transmission of qualities—have finally produced the effect that was to have been expected. The last half dozen generations have consisted wholly of males. That is what the human race might come to, if only the confounded Winters would kill off the women!

— Men sneer at mob rule, and revere the reign of law. Let us think: the one exterminated a Casey, the other tolerates a Honcharenko!

Loved Once.

I classed, appraising once,
Earth's lamentable sounds; the "well-
a-day,"
The jarring "yea" and "nay,"
The fall of kisses on unanswering clay,
The sobbed "farewell," the "welcome" mournfuler:—
But all did leave the air
With a less bitter leaven of sure despair,
Than these words "I loved once!"

And who saith, "I loved once?"
Not angels, whose clear eyes love, love foresee,
Love through eternity!
Who, by to love, do apprehend to be.
Not God, called Love, his noble crown-name,—casting
A light too broad for blinding!
The Great God, changing not from everlasting,
Saith never, "I loved once."
Oh, never is "loved once!"
Thy word, thou Victim-Christ, misprized friend?
Thy cross and curse may rend;
But, having loved, Thine lovest to the end!
It is man's saying man's! Too weak to move
One sphered star above,
Man desecrates the eternal God-word,
With his "no more," and "once."

How say ye, "We loved once,"
Blasphemers! Is your earth not cold enow,
Mourners, without that snow!
Ah, friends! and would ye wrong each other so?
And could ye say of some, whose love is known,
Whose prayers have met your own,
Whose tears have fallen for you, whose smiles have shone,
Such words, "We loved them once!"

Could ye "We loved her once!"
Say calm of me, sweet friends, when out of sight!
When hearts of better right
Stand in between me and your happy light!
And when, as flowers kept too long in shade,
Ye find my colors fade,
And all that is not love in me, decayed?
Such words, "Ye loved me once!"

Could ye "We loved her once!"
Say cold of me, when further put away
In earth's sepulchral clay?
When mute the lips which deprecate to day!—
Not so! not then—least then! When life is shriven,
And death's full joy is given;
Of those who sit and love you up in heaven
Say not, "We loved them once."

Say never, ye loved once!
God is too near above, the grave beneath,
And all our moments breathe
Too quick in mysteries of life and death,
For such a word. The eternities avenge
Affections light of range—
There comes no change to justify that change,
Whatever comes—loved once!
And yet that same word "once!"

Is humanly acceptive! Kings have said,
Shaking a discredited head,
"We ruled once,—dotards, "We—once taught and led;"—
Cripples once danced in the vines; and bards approved
Were once by eorings moved;
But love strikes one hour—love. Those never loved
Who dream that they loved once.

California Mines in London.

EXCELSIOR HYDRAULIC GOLD WASHING COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA (LIMITED).—Capital, £250,000 in 15,000 ordinary shares (taken by the vendors), and 20,000 15 per cent. cumulative preference shares (1,500 shares taken by the vendors) of £10 each. To complete the purchase, £20,000 in cash will also be paid. Messrs. Chadwicks, Adamson and Collier, now invite applications for 13,500 of the preference shares. It is proposed to acquire and work by hydraulic power the Coon Hill auriferous gravel deposits near Placerville, California; to work a well-known auriferous vein of quartz; to purchase the canals, tributaries, water franchises, etc., already existing in that locality; and to construct a canal about thirty miles long, to bring water from a higher level, for washing out gold deposits.

EXCELSIOR GOLD AND SILVER MINING CO. (LIMITED).—Capital, £200,000, in 21 shares. 15,588 shares as yet unallotted have been advertised for subscription at par, the whole £1 per share being payable on application. It is stated that the mine has now been brought into a paying condition, and that the money now obtained will be expended in erecting additional crushing and milling machinery. The property is extensive, and is situated on Silver Mountain, California.

—In an article describing a visit to the State Prison, a Bulletin reporter gives the story of a certain convict, as related by himself. The narrator concludes thus: "I have resolved not to commit any crimes hereafter, and think the resolution will be kept. No, thank you. I don't care for any money. You are welcome to what I have said if it is of any value." Now it is extremely probable that a reporter offered any one money! If anything was wanting to render the degradation of this convict complete, it was to be represented as having been subjected to this indignity. Offered money by a reporter—Great Scott! Pressed to accept the wages of sin, not as honest garden for honest work, but as alms! Was ever so damning a disgrace put upon a defenceless and comparatively respectable man? We do not see why this heartless journalist should libel this helpless convict.

Outside.

Just a gleam thro' the darkness—	Just a face in the lamplight ;
The lift of two eyes from a book—	A hand, and some glittering hair ;
A glance—but some glances are heaven ;	But hearts have been broken, 'tis said,
To such eyes 'tis given	And white steel stained red
To make paradise in a look.	For faces less faultlessly fair.

Just a girl in her beauty,
Her glory of freshness and youth ;
But what has earth better to sigh for,
To live for—to die for—
Than innocence, beauty, and youth?

—Every Saturday.

New Books.

"The Federal Government—Its Officers and their Duties." By Ransom H. Gillet ; published by Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co., New York ; Bancroft & Co., San Francisco. A well-written volume, and as a book of reference, it should be in every library ; particularly appropriate to persons in public positions, as it points out their duties in terse form.

"Morning Glories." By L. M. Alcott, author of "Little Women" ; published by G. W. Carleton, New York ; Bancroft & Co., San Francisco. Christmas is so near at hand that the little folks are already preparing their stockings for Santa Claus, and the publishers are filling their shelves with holiday books. Among these, "Morning Glories" is one of the most attractive publications of the season, being beautifully printed, bound and illustrated, and filled with fantastic tales of faeries, elves and mermaids, that cannot fail to please the children. Our favorite story is "Polly's Pranks." Miss Polly, thinking she is about to die, makes her will and bestows her worldly wealth in the following impartial way :

"Nelly, I'll give you my bead ring ; I shant want it any more. And Cy may have the little horse ; he lost his tail, but I put on the lamb's tail and he is as good as ever. I wish to give away my things 'fore I die, and Nelly, won't you bring me the scissors?"

"What for?" said Nelly, sniffing more than ever.

"To cut off my hair for mamma. She'll want it, and I like to cut things."

Nelly got the scissors, and Poppy cut away all she could reach, giving directions about her property while she sniffed.

"I wish papa to have my pictures and my piece of poetry I made. Give baby my doll and the quacking duck. Tell Billy if he wants my collection of bright buttons he can have 'em ; and give Hattie the yellow plaster dog with my love."

Here mamma came in with a poultice and reassured the invalid.

— Two gentlemen of Nevada County have begun the manufacture of brandy from manzanita berries. The liquor is described as very good tippie. It is certainly most excellent for medical purposes, being the most powerful stringent ever invented.

— The White Christian gentlemen who reddened their lily hands in Chinese blood at Los Angeles are clearing out. Let them come to San Francisco where they will be protected by public opinion—that of the Examiner, for example.

— A Maryland Bishop of the Episcopal Church has had a quarrel with an insubordinate pastor of one of his flock, and has broken his jaw. It was not thus that Samson of old treated the good stout weapon that had done him service.

— A gentleman detained in Europe has recently been married in Pittsburg by proxy. This is a very convenient arrangement, but how much better it would be if one might marry in person and live with his wife by proxy. One may.

— We are pained to state that our esteemed townsman, the citizen Sam. Platt, has met his death. But it is a comfort to know that the latter, after taking a fair look at him, walked off and tackled a small newsboy.

— The editor of the Alaska Herald says he can point to his record with pride. That is the feeling with which a plague-spotted Kanaka woman surveys her leprous whelp.

— It has again been decided that the unsupported testimony of a murderess is sufficient for her acquittal. The woman Sullivan, of Martinez, who recently shot the head off her brother-in-law as he sat at dinner, has been allowed to go free. Her defence was that the deceased had made improper proposals to her, and the jury, with the usual inability to distinguish testimony from evidence, and evidence from proof, brought in that stereotyped insult to our intelligence commonly termed a verdict. If Madame Potiphar were alive how she would admire the quick shotgun retribution wreaked upon the modern Joseph!

— The most characteristic instance of French patriotism that we have lately had the honor to read of is that of a gentleman who destroyed his eyesight that he might no longer behold the brutal Germans occupying his beloved country. Had that man been drafted into the French army and set upon the field of glory, the chances are that he would have run away. We have never known a zealous patriot who was not either a woman, a boy, a civilian or a poltroon.

---

— A dispatch from Sacramento reads as follows: "Thanksgiving Day passed pleasantly, with general enjoyment, and an unusual absence of the uproar and disquiet that characterizes the national festival." We were not previously aware that "uproar and disquiet" were characteristics of Thanksgiving; we had supposed that Gluttony commonly did his work in profound silence. We don't know everything, it appears.

---

— A contemporary, who opposes the infliction of corporal punishment in schools, is never tired of the phrase, "imparting knowledge by the use of the rod." This is nonsense; the rod is not used as a means of imparting knowledge. It is employed only for the purpose of making the pupil behave himself while knowledge is imparted by flinging the ferule at him.

— The Rev. T. H. Broome, of England, has discovered the origin of the characters of the Hebrew alphabet, in the configuration of the constellations. We had just finished an elaborate paper, tracing the origin of these characters to the lines upon the sole of the human foot. Will Mr. Broome kindly hold off till we can dispose of the manuscript?

— A dispatch from New York says the Russian Grand Duke attended the Greek Church and all the congregation remained standing throughout the services. If we worshipped at that church, instead of Dr. Scott's, we should desire that His Highness might come as seldom as possible. We should regard the services as a standing joke.

— The great moral influence of the press is the central fact of the nineteenth century.—N. Y. Tribune. (Eh, what's that! once more, please. We seem to have heard that strain before. Could it have been from the press! Ah, yes! now we think of it, it was from the press. Brethren, let us believe.

Profitable Investment of Capital.

During the past year California has attracted the attention of the civilized world by some remarkable examples of its agricultural capacity. With a farming population of less than 24,000, directly engaged in the cultivation of the soil, the estimated value of its principal staples for 1872, exclusive of the precious metals, is upwards of $75,000,000—more than the total gold and silver product of the United States. The yield of wheat alone is estimated at from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. These extraordinary results have been accomplished by the individual labor and energy of our farming population. Very little aid has been furnished by capitalists in the production of agricultural industry; a large proportion of our available means having been absorbed in enterprises of a more speculative and therefore more attractive character. Nevertheless, the country has steadily prospered, and the outlook for the year is more encouraging than ever. In all probability the value of our agricultural products for 1873 will reach $120,000,000; and there is every reason to expect that there will be a large increase in our population.

If there was a more intelligent appreciation of our resources in San Francisco; if men of means could be induced to see that there are investments sure to pay better in the long run than stock-jobbing operations, it might be possible to secure at home such aid and co-operation in works of internal improvement and the establishment of manufactures as would give an impulse unprecedented in our history to the material progress of this State. But the amount of available capital is limited, and it will probably be many years before we can look to financial circles in this city for the necessary means to carry out any important scheme for the development of our domestic industry. Within the past three years, it is true, a few of our leading men have given some practical evidence of a disposition to engage in undertakings likely to be of permanent advantage to the State, but they have not had such encouragement from quarters where assistance might reasonably be expected as to enable them to advance very rapidly in their operations. Another drawback may be found in the persistent efforts of the local press throughout the country to prevent the success of any scheme, however beneficial to the State, involving the control of large bodies of land. If capitalists can be found to spend large sums of money for the benefit of impecunious settlers, without reference to their own emoluments, of course all such objections will be removed; but it is safe to predict that without general co-operation in works of a public character, very little advance will be made, and the classes who need capital will continue to find it scarce.

A glance at our tule and marsh lands will show that there are sources of inexhaustible wealth yet undeveloped in California. The State Surveyor General, in his report for 1870, estimates the area of swamp and overflowed lands at 3,000,000 acres. This land, if reclaimed and under cultivation, would produce more, he says, for a given number of years (say ten) than all the rest of the land in the State together; and he considers it rather a misfortune that we have not more of the same kind—experience having demonstrated that it is even better and more productive than our uplands. As high as eighty bushels of wheat to the acre has been produced on some of these lands, and the average will not fall short of thirty-five to forty bushels.

Properly speaking, there are three classes of land in California subject to overflow: the tule lands bordering on our lakes and rivers, the low alluvial valley lands, and the salt marshes bordering on the shores of our bays and estuaries.

The tule lands derive their name from a species of gigantic rush which grows upon them, forming a mass of roots and fibres that contribute mainly to the growth of the land itself. For centuries past these tules have been burnt off by the Indians in search of game, during the dry season of the year, and the accretions formed by the roots, mingled with the ashes, together with the deposits of soil carried down from the uplands, have gradually caused them to rise above the level of the ordinary water surface. In seasons of flood, or by the action of the tide, where it prevails, they are of course submerged, unless protected by levees or embankments.

The principal tule lands of California lie along the San Joaquin River as far as their junction with the tule lands of the Sacramento, which commence above Red Bluff, following southerly both sides of the Sacramento River till they form the great delta in which the two rivers are united.

Near the lakes and high up on the rivers, the land is of a more compact texture and contains more soil than in the delta below, receiving the first and heaviest deposits of earth from the mountain streams and adjacent uplands. The leveling tengency of water would doubtless in time elevate the surface beyond the reach of ordinary floods. Even within the past twenty years a natural process of reclamation has brought within the cultivatable area many thousand acres of land which formerly produced nothing but tule.

Of the specific value of these lands in different parts of the State it is not my purpose to speak at present; but I may be allowed to express the opinion that wherever the soil is most compact will be better suited to wheat than in those localities where the texture is chiefly fibrous.

The rich clay lands of this character in the valleys of the Sacramento are unsurpassed for the production of the cereals. They will also grow tobacco, sorghum, beets and various other useful products. Cotton is yet an experiment in the valley of the Sacramento, and it may be that the Spring frosts are too late and the Autumn frosts too early to afford much hope of success in the cultivation of that staple so far north.

Within the past few years more attention has been given to the reclamation and cultivation of the tule lands embraced in the delta of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, above Suisun Bay, than to those of any other locality. Peculiar advantages exist here for drainage and irrigation by means of levees. At high tide the water supplied by the main rivers is backed up, and can easily be distributed over the land; at low tide it can be drained off by sluice-gates; and when neither irrigation nor drainage is required, the gates may be kept closed, leaving only such outlets as may be necessary for the escape of seepage.

The land is exceedingly rich, being composed for a depth of eighteen or twenty feet of rotted roots and debris from above, all thoroughly rotted below the stratum of living fibers.

Considerable work has been done during the past year on the principal islands of the Sacramento and San Joaquin delta. Rough and Ready, containing about 1,600 acres, is now under cultivation. The cost of reclamation up to the present time has been about $8 an acre. Venice Island, owned by J. Mora Moss and others, is encircled by a substantial levee, and contains several thousand acres of very fine land, most of which is now available for cultivation. Mandeville Island, 1,000 acres, is owned by Col. Jack Hays, Capt. Trenner and others, who have built an excellent house on the premises, where Col. Hays and his family are now temporarily residing. This is a very fine tract, and will be cultivated in part and used for grazing purposes this year. Bacon Island, containing 10,000 acres, is owned by N. D. Bacon and others, who have nearly completed the reclamation. Work has been vigorously prosecuted on this island during the past season, and it will soon be placed beyond all danger of floods. The land is excellent, and the location convenient of access. Boland Island contains about 6,000 acres, and is owned by Messrs. Cassell & Co. The amount expended in the reclamation so far is about $20,000. Staten Island, owned by Hazen & Tevis, contains about 8,000 acres. Reclamation is making rapid progress on this island, and it will undoubtedly prove a very valuable investment. The land is rich and well located. Twatched Island, 3,600 acres, owned by Prather Brother, Minor and Roberts, has been under partial cultivation for two years. Cost of reclamation, $12 per acre. The first wheat crop was exceedingly fine, averaging forty bushels to the acre. About 1,000 acres was planted. Last year the wheat was planted too early, and was damaged by the flood. This year the land will be thoroughly plowed and worked, and 1,500 to 2,000 acres will be planted. As high as eighty bushels to the acre has been produced on this island. Brannan and Andros Islands, containing over 12,000 acres, are in process of reclamation, at an estimated cost of about $6 an acre. The unreclaimed and is held at $25 an acre; reclaimed at $40 to $50, depending on location. A tract of 3,000 acres was recently sold for $25 an acre. Sherman Island contains 16,000 acres, is situated near the hight of the delta, where the waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin empty into Suisun Bay. The levees have necessarily been expensive; but it may be considered proof against all floods. The farmers living on this island have manifested great energy and perseverance, and will doubtless soon reap satisfactory rewards. The land is wonderfully productive, yielding forty to fifty bushels of wheat to the acre, and vegetables of fine quality and such enormous proportions as to excite the astonishment of visitors from abroad. Present value of farms, assessments paid, from $45 to $100 an acre. Grand Island, 16,000 acres has been reclaimed, or nearly so, at a cost of about $8 an acre. Value of the land from $40 to $50 an acre. The Webb Tract, above Antioch, contains some 20,000 acres, and is in process of reclamation. It is now encompassed by a levee, which will be increased in size as soon as practicable. Amount expended, $4 an acre; value from $40 to $50. Some sales of tracts on this island have recently been made to settlers at $25 an acre; but good selections cannot be had now at that rate.

Grizzly Island, situated in Suisun Bay, contains 12,000 acres, and has had about $80,000 expended in its reclamation. The land is exceedingly rich, and bands of sheep and cattle are now grazing on it. During eight months in the year the water at the upper end is fresh; at other times brackish. Messrs. Chapman & Co. are the owners. Nearly all the swamp land in Contra Costa County, embracing several districts, amounting in the aggregate to about 50,000 acres, is now in process of reclamation; 10,000 acres fronting on Old River has recently been sold to settlers for $25 an acre. The reclamation of this tract cost between $5 and $6 an acre. Work will probably be commenced this Summer on Roberts and Union Islands, embracing an area of 90,000 acres, principally owned by the Tide Land Reclamation Company. The estimates for reclaiming these islands, as made by General B. S. Alexander, Chief of United States Engineers for this coast, will not exceed $4 an acre. A large body of land, extending from near Sacramento City on the East side of the river, comprising the Russian and other Districts, has been partially, and in some places wholly reclaimed. For a distance of twenty-five miles an almost continuous line of fruit orchards extend along the river bank, supplying a large proportion of the apples and peaches used in this city. The Messrs. Sargent have reclaimed a tract adjoining the upland in San Joaquin County, to the east of Bolin and Venice Islands, containing 15,000 acres. Dr. Ryer and his associates have commenced work on Cash and Steamboat Sloughs. Several reclamation districts have been formed, reclamation commenced, and in some instances completed, within an area covering nearly all the overflowed land from Cash Slough on the west side of the Sacramento River to Suisun Bay. One of the most important and extensive reclamation works yet undertaken in the State is that of the Tule Land Company, of which Messrs. Blanding, Rose, McLane, Henston and others are the leading members, commencing at Knight's Landing, on the west bank of the Sacramento, and extending to a point fifteen miles above Colusa, embracing 120,000 acres, of which this Company own 35,000. The cost of reclamation is about $4 an acre. No finer body of land exists in any part of the world. For forty miles it is almost a dead level, with a rich, deep soil, capable of easy cultivation and producing enormous crops of cereals wherever they have been planted. Mr. Reed, President of the State Agricultural Board, has in cultivation, near Knight's Landing, one of the most magnificent wheat fields ever seen in California, the probable yield of which will be forty bushels to the acre. Every acre of the tract reclaimed is capable of producing equally good crops. At the Mormon Settlement the capacity of the soil has been tested by actual results, quite as satisfactory, obtained during the past two years. Directly opposite to this tract, in Sutter County, reclamation has been commenced, and works are to be completed during the coming Summer, embracing over 100,000 acres of equally rich land—estimated cost, from $4 to $5 an acre.

Glancing next at the tule lands of the San Joaquin Valley, we find that they are also very rich, but in consequence of their comparative remoteness and the greater difficulties of reclamation will not be available so soon. Here larger capital will be required and more extensive and costly works. The country adjacent to the lakes being flat, and the drainage not so easily effected, reclamation must be general and a system of canals will be required. Fortunately the San Joaquin Valley Canal Company have taken this matter in hand, and while bringing the waters of King's river, the Merced river, and the waters of Tulare and other lakes under control for purposes of irrigation, will greatly facilitate the process of reclamation. The Southern Pacific Railroad, now extended beyond Visalia, will afford means of transportation for the products of the country, and altogether the outlook is encouraging. Before many years cotton, tobacco, ramie, etc., will be among the most profitable staples of the State.

In addition to the freshwater lands, above referred to, there are within the limits of the State about 200,000 acres of Salt Marsh lands bordering on our bays and estuaries. These lands are also exceedingly rich, being composed of deposits of silt and other matter from the rivers and the sea. Vegetable mold and fine earth are washed down from the uplands, and the sea contributes weeds, grasses, sand, shells and animalculæ. Professor Cook, of New Jersey, says: "The worth of these lands when properly reclaimed can hardly be overestimated. Wherever there is a sufficient amount of clay or mud mixed in with the grass roots and other organic matters of the marsh, it will make the soil inexhaustibly rich." General Alexander, Engineer-in-Chief of the United States, on the Pacific Coast, says: "Their complete reclamation is entirely practicable at small cost. * * * They are in no danger of floods. A dyke four feet above the surface will afford complete protection even against storm tides. When this land is once relieved from salt water it may be freshened sufficiently for grasses in a single season, and for grain and vegetables in two years. This I know from experience." It will certainly be much more valuable than the adjoining uplands, for it will be greatly more productive.

Professor Henry Mitchell, Chief in Physical Hydrography, of the United States Coast Survey, says: "Marshes reclaimed from tide waters are the most fertile and enduring of all soils." Professor Davidson, Chief of the Coast Survey, on this coast, says: "I am satisfied that these lands, when reclaimed, will be productive and valuable, and that eventually all the marsh lands bordering on the bay will be reclaimed."

Captain A. F. Rodgers, of the Coast Survey, who made the actual surveys of these lands, and who is personally more familiar with them than any person on this coast, says: "All the marsh lands on the bays of San Francisco, San Pablo and Suisun may be easily reclaimed, being above the level of ordinary tides, by a system inexpensive compared with the large margin of profit evidently offered by the unexampled richness of the soil and the rapid development of the country."

Notwithstanding the best engineering testimony as to the feasibility of reclaiming these lands at a moderate cost; notwithstanding the example furnished in New Jersey, where land worth comparatively nothing, advanced in a few years from $50 to $500, $1,000 and even $2,000 an acre; notwithstanding the experience of Holland, Great Britain, China and other countries, there are men of influence in San Francisco who will tell you these lands are of no value and can never be reclaimed.

The best proof to the contrary is the fact that wherever reclamation has been attempted it has proved successful. There are many productive patches, already comprising in the aggregate several thousand acres, under cultivation in Napa and Petaluma sloughs, and along the shores of the bay in Alameda county. Mr. E. L. Beard has 8,000 acres nearly reclaimed, upon which bands of cattle are now grazing.

Garden Island, near the town of Alameda, has been reclaimed at a cost of $7 an acre, and will soon be one of the most productive tracts on that side of the Bay.

In fact, reclamation of marsh, swamp and overflowed lands can no longer be an experiment in this State. No enterprise has progressed more rapidly in California during the past three years. Nearly one-half the overflowed lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers are reclaimed or in process of reclamation. The variety of products to which these lands are adapted, their inexhaustible fertility of soil, the facilities existing for irrigation and cheap water transportation, give them an exceptional value. The greatest drawback has been the want of capital to reclaim them thoroughly and on such a scale as to preclude all danger from seepage and floods. British capital has been invited, and Mr. Ross Browne has made two visits to London for the promotion of swamp land enterprises. One of the principal objections urged there against investments of this kind is, that if the lands are so rich and can be reclaimed at so small a cost, there can be no good reason why the necessary capital cannot be had in California; and the fact that application is made to foreign capitalists is taken as prima facie evidence that men of means, who are supposed to be familiar with the resources of their own State, do not look favorably upon such enterprises. The truth is, there is very little available capital on this coast; but the best answer to the objection urged is the fact that the owners of the lands and private associations are reclaiming them as fast as they can—in many cases borrowing money for that purpose at two or three per cent. a month. If that does not show their faith in the value of the lands, it cannot be shown by argument. Within a few years foreign aid will not be required; and it will not be possible to secure large bodies of land, which, after all, will probably be no detriment to the State.

Another question asked is, what are the sources of increase upon which capitalists can depend for dividends?

Good valley lands in California produce about thirty bushels to the acre—reclaimed swamp lands from thirty-five to forty. Assuming the lower figure to be within bounds, three million acres of swamp land thoroughly reclaimed and cultivated, would yield 105,000,000 of bushels. Deduct for cost of plowing, seeding and harvesting, $10 per acre, and we have a net result, at 1½ cents per pound, of $48,250,000, or very nearly double our entire gold product—a pretty good source of income.

Experiments are now being made on Twitchell Island in the cultivation of Ramie, Jute, China Grass and Japan Hemp—for which the soil and climate seem to be peculiarly adapted. Ramie and jute give a net profit to the acre of $100 to $150 annually—enough to recompense the investment fourfold. The large scale on which these experiments are being made will furnish a satisfactory test during the coming season. Ramie is a perennial plant and semi-aquatic. Its value as a textile has no equal. The jute is next in importance, and furnishes material for our wheat and wool sacks. Over 3,000,000 bales are annually exported from Calcutta. Jute is sown like wheat, either in drills or broadcast, and matures in from 60 to 100 days. On the rich plains of Bengal from 3,000 to 4,000 lbs. per acre are grown. The price of jute in the United States is about half that of cotton. There is a duty on the raw material of 30 per cent.; manufactured, 30. Our tide lands will produce it at a less expense than in India, where the advantage of cheap labor is more than counterbalanced by our labor-saving machines. The city of Dundee, in Scotland, contains 76 mills, all engaged in the manufacture of jute and flax, employing 2,000 hands. We will require on this coast, for many years to come, from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 worth of burlaps. It can as well be grown here as in India, thus saving freight and duties, and there is nothing to prevent us from manufacturing all we can produce.

To capitalists at home and abroad these simple facts are submitted. An unprejudiced examination of our resources is all that can reasonably be asked. We need capital to improve these fertile lands in a thorough and substantial manner; and feel confident that a judicious investment in their reclamation and cultivation will pay better in the long run than the most promising speculations in wild-cat mines.

— "Miss Sophie Barney took a premium at a Montgomery (Alabama) Fair as 'the young woman who would make the best wife for a poor man.' We are sorry that we have not received from Alabama the official report of the judges who decided upon the qualities which secured the premium to this young woman. We infer that her merits did not consist in her ability to compose an essay on mental happiness, or a poem on love's young dream, or to play the pianoforte, or to investigate the laws of life, or to dig up Greek roots, or pick a crow with John Stuart Mill, or take a logical tilt with Miss Anthony, or dance the 'German' in the French style, or digest Kant's transcendental categories, or compute by Napier's logarithms, or do any such things. We infer that her merits lay in her ability to get up, in Alabama style, the coffee and griddle-cakes for breakfast, the bacon and greens for dinner, the mush-and-milk for supper, to wash and mend things, sweep and fix the house, make the bed, poke the fire, save the scraps, get good bargains for her small change, keep her own self neat and tidy, mind her tongue and temper, endure the toothache complacently, refrain from gadding, bear with all sorts of masculine faults, display all kinds of feminine virtues, and, like patience on a monument, smile at grief."

— Cardinal Bonaparte, cousin to the late Emperor, has sent 100 crowns to the parish church of Santa Maria, at Rome, to pay for masses for his relative.

Oriole.

Oriole on the willow-tree!
Singing such melodious measures,
Singingst thou of summer pleasures—
Crimsoned fields of honeyed clover,
Sweet to smell in flying over,
Nests on breezy branches swinging,
Carrols in the soft air ringing,
Bluest sky with cloud fleets sailing,
Food and shelter never failing,
Life so rapturous in its living,
Nature never scant of giving,
Love, or sorrow, or such gladness,
As is most akin to madness!
Or for singing, singest thou,
Swayed on yonder slender bough—
In thy song itself delighting
Sweet beyond all poet's writing,
Clear and liquid as the river,
Flowing to the sea forever,
Glad as south winds come in June
To the rose asleep at noon!
Nothing wistful, no way tender,
Voice of Nature's soulless splendor,
Some outpouring of the flame
Burning in thy wing and name,
Song that does to heaven aspire
Even as leaping, quivering fire,
Oriole on the willow tree,
Tell thy fairy tale to me!

Then the oriole laughed again,
Launching at my question vain, [tain,
As the brook laughs down the mound—
Like the laughter of a fountain;
Flashing through the willow-tree
Thus the oriole sang to me:—
"Restless, sorrowing, weak and human,
Most of all a weary woman,
Can a bird-song on a tree
Utter any speech to thee?
Can thy soul receive the gladness
Of a thing that knows not sadness?
Canst thou know, insatiate creature,
All this mighty joy of Nature!

Joy so rich, so full, so fleeting,
Scarce it lives beyond the greeting,
Joy the dancing leaves adorning,
Glittering in the dewy morning,
In the soft winds gayly blowing,
In the sparkling waters flowing,
Utterly intact of sorrow,
Careless for the distant morrow:
Joy that burns in grace and beauty,
Darkened with the ghost of duty,
Rapture bright beyond all loving,
Gladness all dismay reproving,
Now a flame thro' verdure dying,
Now like any swift spark dying;
Nothing tossed by hope or fear,
Shadowed not by smile or tear;
Questioner beneath the tree,
Wouldst thou not an oriole be?"
Underneath the willow tree
Thus the oriole sang to me.

Ah! what could I give for answer
To this gay and glad romance?
Dreams that round me love to linger
On my hot lips laid a finger,
Dreams that held me all unwilling,
Dreams most sad in their fulfilling;
Yet I know them dear and tender
More than all this song of splendor;
Dear as thorns are to the roses,
Dear as graves where love reposes;
Could I lose them out of living,
I, who asked not for thy giving?
I, who on a weary day
Threw my dreaming soul away,
Would I take it back again,
Pure of joy and pure of pain,
Nevermore to thrill or languish,
Nevermore to throb with anguish,
Ne'er earth's dread delight to prove,
Nevermore to live—or love?
Oriole on the willow-tree,
Still I must a woman be!

John Chinaman.

John has been invaluable to the California demagogue, furnishing for him a sop of hatred and prejudice to throw before "enlightened constituencies." It needs but to mention the "filthy Chinaman" to provoke an angry roar from the mass meeting. Yet the Chinaman is not entirely filthy. He washes his entire person every day when practicable; he loves clean clothes; his kitchen utensils will bear inspection. When the small-pox raged so severely in San Francisco a few years since, there were very few deaths among his race. But John is not nice about his house. He seems to have none of our ideas concerning home comfort. Smoke has no terror for him; soap he keeps entirely for his clothes and person; floor and wall-washing are things never hinted at; and the refuse of his table is scarcely thrown out of doors. Privacy is not one of his luxuries—he wants a house full; where there is room for a bunk, there is room for a man. An anthill, a beehive, a rabbit-warren are his models of domestic comfort; what is stinted room for two Americans is spaciousness for a dozen Chinese. Go into one of their cabins at night, and you are in an oven full of opium and lamp-smoke. Recumbent forms are dimly seen lying on bunks above and below. The chattering is incessant. Stay there ten minutes, and as your eye becomes accustomed to the smoke you will dimly see blue bundles lying on shelves aloft. Anon the bundles stir, talk and puff smoke. Above is a loft six feet square; a ladder brings it in communication with the ground floor. Mongolians are ever coming down, but the gabble of tongues above shows that a host is still left. Like a car, a Chinese house is never full. Nor is it ever quiet. At all hours of the night may be heard their talk and the clatter of their wooden shoes. A Chinaman does not retire like an American, intending to make a serious business of his night's sleep. He merely "lops down" half dressed, and is ready to arise at the least call of business or pleasure.

While at work in his claim his fire is always kindled near by, and over it a teapot. This is his beverage every half hour. His tea must be hot, strong, and without milk or sugar. He also consumes a terrible mixture sold him by white traders, called indiscriminately brandy, gin or whisky, yet an intoxicated Chinaman is the rarest of rare sights. Rice he can cook elegantly, every grain being steamed to its utmost degree of distension. Soup he makes of no other meat than pork. The poorest among his hordes must have a chicken or a duck for his holiday. He eats it merely parboiled. He will eat dog also, providing it is not long past maturity.

The Chinese grocery stores are museums to the American. There are strange dried roots, strange dried fish, strange dried land and marine plants, ducks and chickens, spiced, pressed thin and smoked; dried shellfish; cakes newly made, yellow, glutinous and fatty, stamped with ten-box characters; and great earthen jars filled with rotteness. I speak correctly, if perhaps too forcibly, for when those earthen jars are opened to serve a customer with some manner of vegetable cut in long strips, the native-born American finds it expedient to hold his nose. American storekeepers in the mines deal largely in Chinese goods. They know the Mongolian names of the articles inquired for, but of their character, their composition, how they are cooked or how eaten, they can give no information. It is heathenish "truck," by whose sale they make a profit. Only that and nothing more.

A Chinese miner's house is generally a conglomeration of old boards, mate, brush, canvas and stones. Rusty sheets of tin sometimes help to form the edifice. Anything lying about loose in the neighborhood is certain in time to form a part of the Mongolian mansion.

When the white man abandons mining ground he often leaves behind very serviceable frame houses. John comes along to glean the gold left by the Caucasian. He builds a cluster of shapeless huts. The deserted white man's house gradually disappears. A clapnet is gone, and then another, and finally all. The skeleton of the frame remains, months pass away, piece by piece the joists disappear; some morning they are found tumbled in a heap, and at last there is nothing left save the cellar and chimneys. Meantime, John's clusters of huts swell their rude proportions, but you must examine them narrowly to detect any trace of your vanished house, for he revels in smoke, and everything about him is soon colored to a hue much resembling his own brownish-yellow countenance. Thus he picks the domainary skeleton bare, and then carries off the bones. He is a quiet but skillful plunderer. John No. 1 on his way home from his mining, clann rips off a board; John No. 2 next day drags it a few yards from the house; John No. 3 a week afterward drags it home. In this manner the dissolution of your house is protracted for months. In this manner he distributes the responsibility of the theft over his entire community. I have seen a large boarding house disappear in this way, and when the owner, after a year's absence, revisited the spot to look after his property, he found his real estate reduced to a cellar.

John himself is a sort of museum in his character and habits. We must be pardoned for giving details of these, mingled promiscuously, rather after the museum style. His New Year comes in February. For the Chinaman of limited means it lasts a week, for the wealthy it may endure three. His consumption of fire-crackers during that period is immense. He burns strings a yard in length suspended from poles over his balconies. The uproar and spluttering consequent on this festivity in the Chinese quarter at San Francisco is tremendous. The city authorities limit the Celestial Pandemonium to a week.

He does not forsake the amusement of kite-flying even when arrived at maturity. His artistic imitations of birds and dragons float over our house-tops. To these are often added contrivances for producing hollow, mournful, buzzing sounds, mystifying whole neighborhoods. His game of shuttlecock is to keep a cork, one end being stuck with feathers, flying in the air as long as possible, the impelling member being the foot, the players standing in a circle and numbering from four to twenty. Some show great dexterity in kicking with the heel. His vocal music to our ears seems a monotonous cat-rattle. His violin has but one string; his execution is merely a modified species of saw-dling.

He loves to gamble, especially in lotteries. He is a diligent student of his own comfort. Tramping on foot during a hot day, he protects himself with an umbrella and refreshes himself with a fan. In place of prosaic signs on his store-fronts, he often inscribes quotations from his favorite authors.

He is a lover of flowers. His balcony and window-sills are often thickly packed with shrubs and creepers in pots. He is not a speedy and taciturn eater. His tea-table talks are full of noisy jollity, and are often prolonged far into night.

He is a lover of the drama. A single play sometimes requires months for representation, being, like a serial story, "continued" night after night. He never dances. There is no melody in the Mongolian foot. Dancing he regards as a species of Caucasian insanity.

To make an oath binding he must swear by the head of a cock cut off before him in open court. Chinese testimony is not admissible in American courts. It is alleged Cantonian axiom that a Chinaman cannot speak the truth. But cases have occurred wherein, he being an eye-witness, the desire to hear what he might tell as to what he had seen has proved stronger than the prejudice against him; and the more effectively to clinch the chances of his telling the truth, the above, his national form of oath, has been resorted to. He has among us some secret government of his own. Before his secret tribunals more than one Mongolian has been hurried in Star-Chamber fashion, and never seen afterward. The nature of the offences thus visited by secret and bloody punishment is scarcely known to Americans. He has two chief deities—a god and a devil. Most of his prayers are offered to his devil. His god, he says, being good and well disposed, it is not necessary to propitiate him. But his devil is evil, and must be won over by offering and petition. Once a year, whenever collected in any number, he builds a thrifty sort of temple, decorates it with ornaments of tinsel, lays piles of fruit, meats and sugared delicacies on an altar, keeps up night and day a steady clash of gongs, and installs therein some great, uncouth wooden idols. When this period of worship is over the "joss house" disappears, and the idols are unceremoniously stowed away among other useless lumber.

He shaves with an instrument resembling a butcher's cleaver in miniature. Nature generally denies him beard, so he shaves what a sailor would term the fore and after part of his head. He reaps his hirens crop dry, using no lather. His cue is pieced out by silken braid, so interwoven as gradually to taper into a slim tassel, something like a Missouri mule-driver's "black-snake whip-lash." To lose this cue is to lose caste and standing among his fellows. No misfortune for him can be greater.

Course cowhide boots are the only articles of American wear that he favors. He inclines to buy the largest sizes, thinking he thereby gets the most for his money, and when his No. 7 feet wobble and chafe in No. 12 boots he complains that they "fit too much."

He cultivates the vegetables of his native land in California. They are curiosities like himself. One resembles our string-bean, but is circular in shape and from two to three feet in length. It is not in the least stringy, breaks off short and crisp, boils tender very quickly and affords excellent eating. He is a very careful cultivator, and will spend hours picking off dead leaves and insects from the young plants. When he finds a dead cat, rat, dog or chicken, he throws it into a small vat of water, allows it to decompose, and sprinkles the liquid fertilizer thus obtained over his plantation. Watermelon and pumpkin seeds are for him desert delicacies. He consumes his garden products about half cooked in an American culinary point of view, merely wilting them by an immersion in boiling water.

Leaves from a Lady's Diary.

FEBRUARY 24th.—I was thinking to-day, as I was helping Mamie W. to dress for a ball, and noticed the look of admiration which she cast at herself in her Psyche, how very much after all a woman prefers the reflection of admiration from a man's eyes. A girl alone will pose and practice before a glass, but her true mirror is the opposite sex. If she cannot reflect well there, she is miserable. But at the same time, the infinite pains we take to appear well is not only directed to charm the other sex, but at the same time to eclipse dear Mary B. or Madame X. According to naturalists, it is the male bird or fish that covers himself with brilliant hues, and seeks to attract by agaceries, the female in the meantime remaining in sober russet, demurely receiving the impetuous attentions of her brilliant mate. Such might have been, when young ladies spun woolsey linsey and called themselves Tabitha or Dorcas. I am vexed because I was not asked to any of the grand parties lately, and am vexed at hearing those who were there, for every one that was asked went, talking loudly of the enjoyment they had, in order to attract attention to the fact of their having been there; yet, as Carlyle said one night when the falling stars were raining fast through the sky, "How very sad to see such a waste of brilliancy." Coming back from a ball makes me think that the fable of Cinderella is, after all, more true than we dare acknowledge to ourselves. We leave glitter, gloss, paint, varnish, noise, compliments, music, dancing, eating, feasting, toasting, drinking to slink into our carriage and creep to our bedroom, to become what? In most instances a household drudge, full of the strong, stern realities of life; and it is better in most instances that it should be so.

FEB. 26th.—Aah Wednesday. I always liked this day, for the bitter curses that the old Church, in its commination, hurled at the head of sinners, to which all the sinning congregation piously answer amen; it's so applicable to California. "Cursed be him who removeth his neighbor's land mark," to which the devout tribe of squatters most fervently reply, "Amen." So may it be when I stick my stake in the debatable land. Went to St. Mary's Cathedral, for I like the ceremony, having been much impressed when a little girl by the cross of ashes on my forehead. This time, however, it made no impression, and I fancied that the ashes were dirty. I was reminded of what Keat's wrote:

"There was an awful rainbow once in Heaven,
We know her woof, her texture, she is given
In the dull catalogue of common things,
Philosophy will clip an angel's wings."

Was amused, the night before last, at the wonderful memory possessed by some regular ball-goers, both male and female. They herd together at intervals and compare notes. Miss S. has got on the identical lace berthe that she wore at Mrs. B.'s reception, and, I do declare, Mary B. has got on her mother's diamonds.

FEB. 27th.—Went with Emily to a school where all is conducted on the highest moral principles. Everything that tends to natural development is as strictly restrained as possible. Instead of leading the instinct, it is sought to be smothered; the passions are proscribed instead of being properly directed; the animated corpses who undertake to direct these young, growing minds, only strive to carry away the steam, but not to subdue the fire and water, so that in matter of fact they remain utterly ignorant of anything till an explosion takes place, and then they say, "Who would have thought it?" I was sitting last night in my bed-room just tired enough to fall into reverie, and my fire was just burning enough, having done with flame and indulging in genial glow, to chain me to my chair when I pondered that the aims of vanity and emulation, even friendship itself, may be likened to "Faces in the fire." A dream of love, a picture of married life, a desire to do good, an expectation of pleasant days—Faces in the fire. The dwelling on the possible features of an unborn child, the earnest desire that he may achieve greatness, the certainty that one will be with him helping, guiding, consoling, cheering and loving. Faces in the fire.

A Glance at France and Russia.

France has been very busy with the rival claimants for the throne that has disappeared. A fusion or coalition between the Orleanists and Bourbons has been much talked of, but seems to amount to nothing definite. The same uncertainty surrounds the Imperialists' manifestoes. The submission to the country of the question of a Monarchy or a Republic is again proposed, and the unextinguished power of Napoleon in France is manifested in many ways. The ghastly, though talented picture, of the body of the Emperor, which appeared in the Graphic, has been suppressed, on account of the impression it produced in Paris—a strange illustration of liberty under a Republic. M. Thiers appears to have achieved a complete victory over the Committee of Thirty, and continues his raid upon members of the International Society. The look-out for France, should anything suddenly happen to the aged President, is very disturbing.

In reference to the Russia in Asia question, the principal item of news is that General Kantmann delayed joining the Khiva Expedition until the return of Count Schouvaloff from England; that a Cabinet Council was held, and that General Kantmann immediately afterwards left for the frontier. The "few honeyed words" in London had, it was conjectured, made everything pleasant. Various reports are brought by the telegraph respecting the campaign. Turkey is represented as feeling herself more deeply interested even than Great Britain. The cession of territory by the Shah of Persia is declared to have been by a firman, not a secret treaty, in which case the Persian Minister would have done better to remain silent than to have sent his denial to the Press. As to the statement about a neutral zone, we must evidently wait the assembling of Parliament before knowing what is really contemplated. Besides this question, the only other special news from the Continent is a victory over Carlist troops, which is said to have restored confidence to the Government.

The Modern God-head--The Golden Eagle, the Silver Dollar and Copper Cent.

[We publish the contributions of the "Parson" not because we at all indorse the doctrines enunciated by him, but wholly on account of their brightness, and leave our readers to sift for themselves the wheat from the chaff.]

DEAR NEWS LETTER:--The prayerful Five assembled at the little chapel at The Oaks last Sabbath, to listen to a sermon from their beloved pastor on the Great American God-head. The Parson was induced to take the foregoing popular Trinity for a text, in consequence of listening to a lecture delivered last week at the Congregational Church by the Rev. A. L. Stone. That holy man of God found much fault with the people because they would not surrender all they were possessed of to God—not only their body and mind, but their worldly goods. But the cream of the joke was, the rev. gentleman elected himself one of God's especial agents to make collections on this terrestrial planet, and to have and to hold the plunder until such time as his august master should call for it. The rev. beggar did not want a portion, but all we had: a complete surrender of everything to his keeping, in trust for God. He wanted us to take no thought for the morrow, but to trust implicitly in Divine Providence for our hash. The Five went with me to hear Mr. Stone, and were so much impressed with the earnestness, honesty, and sincerity of his appeal to their, not generosity, but duty to the God of the Christian, that they were likely to become utterly impoverished in their zeal to gratify the desire of the rev. minister's needy Almighty. The Blind Sister gave all the money she had, then took off her jewels and laid them cheerfully on the altar, and shed grateful tears for the blessed privilege. The Azure-Eyed Girl, in emulating the noble example of her sister, carried the donation business to its extreme limit. She spread her shawl on the floor, threw in her money, bracelets, rings, ear-rings, and breast-pin; took off her switch and waterish (real hair), and crept out of her robes, leaving nothing for herself to walk home in but an old pair of slippers and a hoop skirt. The Pet Lamb, in her religious enthusiasm, threw herself into the arms of the vice-regent of God, and shouted "Hallelujah," crying "Take all for Jesus!" Mr. Stone was a little surprised at this remarkable outcropping of the holy spirit, and came very near accepting the tempting offer, but a sober second thought came to his rescue, and knowing he would have to pay her board, thereby levying a tax on the Lord, he relieved her of all her upholstery, money and jewels, declining the living portion of the donation. He then gave her his blessing, and sent her away with nothing on but her hair, singing that blessed anthem, "The Lord will provide." Deacon Scott rushed up to the altar and subscribed three cords of wood and a ton of coal; his mind was evidently running in a downward course, and bent on warming things up. The Judge walked solemnly up to the Holy of Holies, and with a slow and melancholy motion drew a pint flask of old rye from his pocket and laid it lovingly in the hands of Dr. Stone. Bestowing one longing, lingering look of heartrending affection on his departing idol, he turned away with tears in his eyes, muttering to himself "It is finished; what I lend to the Lord in pints may return to me in gallons." But the Parson was an old bird, not to be caught with chaff; he'd been there, and knew how it was himself. He therefore gathered the Five together, placed them in a hack, took them home, and then sat down and wrote a sermon on the only living, true, and available God-head of modern times. The discourse was delivered to a large concourse of people last Lord's Day, at The Oaks:

THE PARSON.

Court Chat.

— With the view of keeping the ex-Emperor's memory green in the soul of his admirers a miniature terra-cotta bust of the deceased is sold as the centerpiece in a bouquet of violets for the small sum of three sous. Mourning letter paper is for sale with his photograph in the corner of each sheet and embossed on the envelopes. There are salet pins also with the head of ex-Cesar. An illustrated sheet recounting the glories of the Second Empire for the use of "the noble peasants of France" is gratuitously distributed. The Republicans have brought out a companion sheet, also illustrated, commencing with Napoleon's shooting the soldier Badinguet in the barracks yard of Boulogne-sur-Mer, in 1840. The impartial historian must look on this picture and on this.

— Messrs. Delann, of Paris, have formed a collection, in six volumes, of caricatures published in Paris in 1870 and 1871. The first series embraces the period from the Declaration of War to the close of August; the second, from Sedan to the fall of Metz; the third, from the surrender of Metz to the March Revolution; the fourth, the reign of the Commune; the fifth and sixth relate to Italian matters, and also comprise satires on Germans of a date posterior to the fall of the Commune. The whole comprises about 1,800 to 2,000 caricatures. One copy has been purchased by Prince Bismarck, a second by the British Museum, and a third is in the hands of the collectors.

— A letter from Madrid in the Paris Temps says that the death of Napoleon III. caused only a little passing emotion in the Spanish capital. On the evening of the day when the news was published, the King and Queen were at the theater. The friends of the Empire complained of this in strong terms as a violation of good manners, and to appease them the King went into mourning for a few days. The display of sympathy began and ended with this formal act.

— Francis Joseph of Austria has done a good thing. He offers a prize of five thousand florins to the journalist who will write the best editorial on Austrian affairs in the German language. Said editorial is not to contain more than one thousand words. It is immaterial what political party the writer belongs to. The Vienna papers think that there will be several thousand competitors for the prize.

— According to a telegram from St. Petersburg, public opinion is excited there by reports of the cruelties inflicted upon the Russian prisoners in Korea. The proposed expedition is therefore in great favor, and preparations for it on a large scale are being vigorously pushed forward. Volunteers from the highest ranks are offering, it is said, to accompany the expedition.

— Miss Ada Wyndham, a relative of Baron Channell's, died on the 23d ult., whilst under the influence of nitrous oxide gas, administered for a dental operation. This is the first recorded death by this new anæsthetic, which it was confidently hoped was entirely free from danger. A verdict of homicide by misadventure was returned at the inquest.

— It is said that Miss Hosmer, who is working away diligently at Rome, has received many orders for her head of Medusa. Instead of treating it in the conventional style, making a repulsive figure, small wings nestle in the tresses surrounding a charming face, and the bust alone is entwined with snakes in the necklace fashion.

— The first ball ever given in the Quirinal took place recently. The rooms had a very brilliant appearance. All the ministers, the members of the diplomatic body, the Roman aristocracy, and the fashionable world were present. The ball terminated with the dance of Sir Roger de Coverley, in honor of Prince Arthur.

— The real name of themorganatic wife of King Victor Emmanuel, whom he now tries to put as his queen upon the throne of Italy, was Rosina Vercellana. She was of very low descent, and when Victor Emmanuel first made her acquaintance in 1846, she was unable to read and write.

— President Thiers' new library embraces one hundred and twenty thousand volumes. They are all uniformly bound in green cloth, except his own works, which his publishers have presented to him bound in the most splendid crimson velvet with gold rims.

— Contrary to report, which said that each of the five sons of the Khedive had had a wife apportioned to him, we now hear that the eldest son had two wives assigned to him, showing that there is some disadvantage, after all, in being first-born.

— Dr. Livingstone is to be presented with a massive gold medal by the Italian Government. The medal was to be ready by the 31 instant, and consigned to Sir Bartle Frere to present it to the great traveler in person, or to forward it by some safe hand.

— A locksmith at Innspruck, in the Tyrol, has invented a pistol, which, he claims, can be fired off twenty-five times in one minute. He has offered his invention to the Minister of War in Vienna for sixty thousand florins.

— The Dowager Empress Amélie of Brazil, Consort of Pedro I., died at Lisbon on the 26th, after a long illness. Don Fernando remained all night in the sick room. The late Empress was very charitable, and is much regretted.

— King John of Saxony has, during his long life, written sixteen books, most of them translations from the Italian and English. His translation of Dante is considered the best existing in German literature.

Defeat.

[BY BARTON GREY.]

He took her hand and looked at her,
No sound did that deep stillness stir;
Even the weary, wandering rain
Had ceased to beat upon the pane;
Only about the perfect mouth
A sigh more faint than the faint south
Hovered of moment's space, and then
Died into nothingness again.

The words he spoke were brief and slow:
What could he say, she did not know;
What pulse of that impetuous soul!
But owned her calm, serene control?
No need for him to test her heart
With cunning fence or verbal art;
Only to ask and wait her will,
And winning, losing, love her still.

Perhaps she wavered—ay, perhaps
The shadow of the cloud that wraps
The future from our questioning gaze
Let in some glimpse of after days,
Some hint of all she might possess
In that true spirit's tenderness,
If but her weaker life might move
Unto the music of his love.

Perhaps! who knows? He only knew
The large gray eyes were dim with dew;
Saw only on the month's sweet bloom
The shadow of reluctant doom;
Felt only one sad, gentle word—
And then thro' the deep stillness heard
Once more the weary, wandering rain
Beat dull against the window pane.

KENTUCKY'S LOVE; OR, ROUGHING IT AROUND PARIS. By Edward King, author of "My Paris." Lee & Shepard, Publishers, Boston.

Mr. Edward King has entered the field early, and made the battle grounds around Paris the scene of a very pretty romance; and he writes with the force of one who has seen what he describes and been through the battles he paints. His descriptions of the destruction and desolation of the charming villages surrounding Paris; of the marching and countermarching of great armies; of a night attack by the French; of Ducrot's great fight at Champigny, are drawn by a master hand, and are alone sufficient to arrest the attention of the reader, without the additional interest of the romance of Kentucky's Love, which runs through the book and diverts our minds, somewhat, from the horrors of war. We quote his description of the return of the wounded:

"Hearing the rumble of approaching wagons, I mounted to my accustomed perch by the side of the driver. Presently, through the semi-mist, a great train of lumbering carts, each drawn by a stout Norman horse, came in sight. Each of these carts contained three or four wounded soldiers—Prussians, Bavarians, Saxons, Wurtembergers, thrown rather than lain, into the springless vehicles, each jolt of which upon the frozen ground wrung groans of anguish from the suffering men. Many had lain upon the skirmish ground, where they had been stricken down, for a whole day before they were cared for; and their limbs were frightfully swollen, their eyes were blood-shot, and their faces blanched by approaching death. The helmets hung on the cart stakes; and the majority of the wounded, with their fatigue caps drawn down over their eyes, lay flat upon their backs, clenching their hands and compressing their lips fiercely at each fresh agony. The drivers stopped us and begged for water. 'We can get none in this accursed country,' one said, 'and the wounded are getting crazy.' A grimy, sodden, blood-stained, discouraged crew! A bleary-eyed, bone-weary, motley gang! A section of the Infirmary, ambulant and modernized! A great holocaust, thrown under the Juggernaut of Prussian ambition and German unity. And a sad and pitiful sight, indeed, these dejected youths and bearded men, bleeding, writhing, and grasping at empty air. 'Turn the cart off by the roadside a few minutes, or I shall die,' cried one slender sufferer as he was jolted past. In the following wagon, three Prussians, badly wounded, were crooning a little song together, and interspersing it with curses and cries of agony. An officer rode hastily by, and looked at them curiously. 'Halt!' he said; 'these men must rest. One is dying,' as indeed it seemed. The Uhlans who rode beside the carts asked us whither we were going. Was there any graveyard made for German soldiers at Montmorency yet? Because there were three dead men in one of the carts yonder, and they disliked to bury them by the roadside."

As will be seen from the above sketch, Mr. Edward King shows keen observation and shrewd powers of judgment, and this book gives one a better idea of the siege of Paris than one-half of the military works on that subject.

"YOUNG AMERICA ABROAD."—"Cross and Crescent." By Oliver Optic (William T. Adams). Lee & Shepard, Publishers, Boston.

This is the third volume of the second series of "Young America Abroad," and gives the experiences and adventures of the young travelers in Turkey and Greece, and cleverly combined with all its fun and frolic, it gives an excellent and truthful history of the countries passed through, and so pleasantly and intelligently conveyed, that important facts in modern and ancient history, geography and mythology will never be forgotten by the readers, young and old, who delight in Oliver Optic's books.

THE TREASURE OF THE SEAS.—By the author of the B. O. W. C. series, Professor James de Mille. Lee & Shepard, Publishers, Boston.

THE DRAWING-ROOM STAGE.—A series of original dramas, comedies, farces and entertainment for Amateur Theatricals and School Exhibitions. By George M. Baker.

Special Brevities.

— The Board of Trade of the Dominion, corresponding to our National Board of Trade, now in session at Ottawa, have adopted resolutions in favor of reciprocity with the United States. Canada seems to be more anxious on this point than we are, partly because she needs reciprocity the most and partly because our attention has been diverted to subjects more strictly political. We shall soon come, however, to the industrial commercial issues, and foremost among them is the question of reciprocity with our nearest neighbors on this continent and the issues of the sea. Free trade with Canada, Mexico, the West Indies and the Sandwich Islands, so as to make us commercially one community, will do more for the mutual interests of all these people than Shellabarger subsidies or Samana Bay Companies.

— It is a curious fact that lithotripsy, supposed to be a modern invention, was known to the ancient Romans, specimens of instruments adapted to the purpose having been found among the ruins of Pompeii. It nevertheless fell into complete oblivion, until it was revived in the present century by Baron Heurteloup, a French surgeon. Various contrivances were used by Heurteloup and others; but the type of that now in use, known as the screw instrument, was devised by Dr. LeStrange, of Dublin. That instrument, or a modification of it, was, we believe, used by Sir Henry Thompson in his recent operation. It obviates many dangers that surround the percussion operation (that of Heurteloup), and provides for the important object of completely removing the broken fragments of the calculus.

— It is generally believed that Mr. Jay Gould has made a good thing by his "restitution" to the Erie Railway shareholders. It appears that he stipulated with the directors before restoring the $9,000,000 that he should have time to bid for 200,000 shares. This he did, and as the price rose £4 a share, the dealers who agreed to deliver must have forfeited about £200,000. He had, however, previously issued other orders in Europe, and the New York papers assert that his total gains amount to $12,000,000, or half a million sterling more than he gave up. For making this money he has received a full discharge of all liabilities of every kind, and a promise that he shall always be consulted on all the important affairs of the railway.

— Drawings have been sent to the War Office, with a view to the construction of two fifty-ton guns fifteen tons heavier than the "Woolwich Infants" at the Royal Arsenal, in case it should be thought desirable to arm ironclads of the Tonnadire class with weapons of that magnitude. The authorities of the Royal Gun Factories have also designed, and are prepared to construct, a gun upon the Frazer system of gun-building, seventy tons in weight, and to throw a projectile of 1,400 pounds. The seventy-ton gun, presuming it to be twice as powerful as the "Woolwich Infant," would pierce twenty-eight inches of armor-plate at the distance of a mile and a half, and would carry shot weighing upwards of half a ton sixteen miles.

— Reporting to the Board of Trade on the fatal accident to Sir Donald M'Leod, on the Metropolitan District Railway, Captain Tyler recommends the adoption, as far as practicable, of a uniform standard for passenger platforms, which would be 3 ft. 1½ in. high, and 2 ft. 4½ in. at the outside edge from the working faces of the rails. He further urges the supply of continuous footboards, remaining above the level of the platforms when the carriages are loaded. Captain Tyler also points out the necessity for careful supervision in regard to the starting of the trains, and expresses an opinion that there ought to be at least as many porters at each station as there may be trains in it at any one time.

— A new paint has been lately produced by the Silicate Paint Company of Liverpool, designed to supersede all other kinds; it is said to be fire and water-proof, never to crack, and always to retain its luster. The chief ingredient in its manufacture is silica, the nature of which is the same as that of flint, and paint thus prepared keeps the surface covered with it in a perfect state of preservation. It is suitable alike for iron or timber, entirely preventing corrosion on the one, and decay on the other, and will bear any amount of heat without blistering or changing color. It is supplied in all colors, and is used in the same way as ordinary paint.

— At a special meeting of the shareholders in the Oriental Bank Corporation on the 30th, the Chairman gave the substance of the Bill which is to be introduced into Parliament on the opening of this session, to enable the Bank to continue the privileges of the charter which has just expired. This Bill has been prepared in case of need, but will not be used if the charter is renewed as expected.

— A correspondent of a provincial newspaper forwards a statement with reference to a Yeovil dairyman who possesses an extraordinary cow—one that supplies fish as well as milk. In a small quantity of white fluid sold by this person lately as milk, a minnow nearly an inch and a half in length was discovered. Moral addressed specially to dairymen: Strain your milk before mixing.

— The White Star Line are about to put on a line of first-class steamers torn between San Francisco and China, consisting of the Republic, Asiatic, Atlantic, Tropic and Rimac. Two of these steamers, the Republic and Atlantic, were for some time in the Liverpool and New York service.

— The quantity of tobacco paying duty and cleared for consumption in the United Kingdom averaged 13½ oz. per head of the population in 1841. In 1851 it had increased to 1 lb. ¼ oz. per head. In 1861 it had reached 1 lb. 3¼ oz. per head. In 1871 it amounted to 1 lb. 5½ oz. per head.

The Emotions.

Of all the funny notions	How can he show what joys him or what
That frolicsome imagination shapes,	ails?
To think that a famous lecturer on apes,	But, ah, my Darwin, does it not perplex,
Should set himself to study Emotions;	Puzzle and vex,
And their Expression, by the features	To trace with even your intense devotion,
Or other lineaments of living creatures!	The various expressions of emotion
With dogs the sign of pleasure that pre-	Employed by what we call the gentle sex?
vails	We think we see a blush—
Is wagging their tails:—	Why, tush! 'tis but a flush
But what expression is in vogue with	Obtainable with powder and brush,
whales?	Or colored lotion!
The monkey grins, but then he can not	And so we fail to trace
laugh.	In woman's face
But the giraffe	The real, plain expression of Emotion!

Vis Comica.

The New York Evening Post, of January 11th, gives a list, "certainly incomplete and possibly incorrect," of the comic papers that have been established in America, to the number of forty-six, exclusive of annuals. The earliest in date is Irving and Paulding's Salmagundi, begun and ended in 1807. The Evening Post invites correction of its list, and we accept the invitation. It omits to mention: The Alla California, and the Morning Call, both dailies, published in this city. The comic element in the former is a good deal diffused, on account of its size, but is of rare quality. Long and careful search by enthusiastic travelers in various parts of the world, has failed to discover anything like this remarkable product. Altogether it is the most senseless and fit paper for laughter. The Call is perhaps less interesting to the general inquirer. Its strong point, full of comic force, but a trifle monotonous, is the daily publication of the number of copies circulated, under the form of an affidavit. Monotonous, no doubt; but even now, after the custom of years, the most hardened reader of the Call lapses into cackinization at the sight of those well-known figures, "sworn to before me." We commend these corrections to the Evening Post, agreeing with it, on the whole, in its remarks on the fate of American comic papers, but altogether refusing to accept the cause assigned for their failure. This is declared by the Post (following the New York World) to be the remarkable freedom, brightness and spiciness of the daily papers throughout the country. We deny the freedom, brightness, etc. Some few brilliant papers there are, but there are hundreds of cities in the Union which do not produce one joke in six months among them all. Take away the New York World, an occasional Tribune, the Boston Post, and the San Francisco paper, and you have exhausted the two coasts. In the interior, there is but the Louisville Courier-Journal. The Post is misled by the cackle of Americanism around it. We may be misled, perhaps, by our distrust of this barn-yard eloquence; but it seems to us that, on the whole, American comic journalism has experienced no peculiarly hard fate. The earliest English comic paper, mentioned in the article in Notes and Queries, in June, 1872, is The Grog, established in 1824. The earliest American, leaving out Salmagundi, bears date 1846. Looking at the difference of the two countries in population and wealth, it seems by no means strange that while England, in fifty years, has buried nearly seventy comic papers, America should have finished off nearly fifty in thirty years. The great and remarkable difference between the two countries is, however, in the character of the journals which survive. The English are of a high order of merit, the American, without exception, insufferably vulgar. It would be unwise and unfair to come to definite conclusions as to the causes of the American inferiority in this branch of literature; but it seems to us to be due to what Renan calls the lack of nobleness in American society, and to the lower intellectual level of the reading community. In this country everybody reads; and nearly everybody publishes a paper. The United States publish only two thousand papers less than the rest of the civilized world; how is it possible that the readers of these papers should be up to the general level of average cultivation in other countries? Everybody has just now a great respect for the Germans. They are very strong; and not only that, they are the most learned of men. But Germany shows only 800 newspapers against the 5,800 of the United States. Our conviction in the matter is that comic journalism is like all other journalism, in this country, a mere game of chance. If the paper comes out at the right moment, and finds the right community to back it, it will succeed. Otherwise it will die; and may it rest in peace!

— Drug clerks be careful, and remember the scriptural adage, "An eye for an eye." The public place themselves almost entirely in your power, and when that power is abused, either through ignorance, carelessness, or vice, the sharp claws of the law are very apt to leave an impression on your smirking countenances. What amount of apology or money can make up to Dr. O'Donnell the loss of his eye? Our advice to the Doctor is, when he gets well, to go for that drug clerk and gouge him. An immense amount of satisfaction would be felt by him could he pocket that Ignoramus's eye.

Blood Thicker Than Water.

The niggers have cause to congratulate themselves. They have always had the Republican party upon their side, and now they are in a fair way to capture the Democracy. Indeed they have shown such talent for promiscuous stealing that the rogues of the entire nation are beginning slowly to appreciate them and come around. There is a wonderful amount of sympathy in knavery. The last convert to niggerdom is Jim Brooks, Democratic Congressman from New York City. Jim has always consistently hated the black race, but was rather vague in his reasons for hating them. At last it comes out; he believed them to be honest. The stories of their disposition to petty larceny, their nipping of every unconsidered trifle that came within their reach, of the proverbial danger run by all manner of pigs and poultry in roosting low, as well as all the legends showing them to be easily tempted by valuables, have fallen upon a doubting ear when recounted to the incredulous Brooks. He would believe no word of it, and so despised them, hair, hoof and horn, as demnation inferior creatures, unworthy to associate or in any manner to intermix with the noble Caucasian. But at last he has been convinced. He sees his mistake, he acknowledges his error, he forgives, and he loves. The lucky nigger who converted Brooks is one Ranny, of South Carolina. This darkey, it appears, can't see any more harm in a member of Congress stealing from the public, than for an old plantation nigger to nip a fat gobbler from his master's roost. The principle is all the same, and both are rather pleasant things to do, so long as you are not caught at it. Brooks was detected speculating in "Credit Mobilier stock," and for a time appeared in danger of being slightly castigated by his master, the people represented in Congress. For a moment, we say, for there was never any real danger of the "scape-goat" business being really carried out in practice. Where the members of a band of robbers have the judging of an offense in which all have participated, there is not likely to be anything very important done. But Brooks was evidently frightened, and when poor Ranny, with the memory of many a stolen pig, fat, crisp and luscious still pervading his palate, came to the rescue, the southern Democratic heart melted, and to Brooks the African was changed in the twinkling of an eye and became a man and a brother. He rushed over to the Black Republican side of the house and fell upon the bosom of his new-found kinsman and wept. It was the most touching scene that has occurred on that historic floor since the death of the "Old Man Eloquent." Japhet acknowledged Ham, lily-white mingled with jet-black, and a new political color was produced in an instant. It was a new form of "miscegenation." "Mr. Ranny," cried the blubbing Brooks, "I feel deeply gratified for the vote you have cast. Heretofore I have been a persistent opponent of your race, but for the future I shall not only be your friend, but the friend of your race." The heart of Ranny must have swelled with joy at the recognition of the place his race held in the great family of thieves. "Boo-oo-hoo," he sobbed on the breast of Brooks, "we are all rogues together. Now let thy servant depart in peace. I have lived to see the day when all who steal are equal." We suggest that the colored people throughout the country make the anniversary of this important event a holiday, ranking with their proclamation day, and that all the thieves in the country, without respect to race or politics, be invited to participate.

— Appropos of the new book just published, entitled "Another World," in which the author seriously professes to give, "from actual experience, a matter-of-fact account of the laws, manners, and customs of a kingdom situated in one of the planets of the solar system." Punch asks the author to be good enough to gratify a pardonable curiosity, and answer the following questions respecting our fellow planetants: Have they a national debt? Have they any "old masters"? Are they forbidden to marry their deceased wives' sisters; or is it legal to do so in the northeast and illegal in the southwest? Do they talk about the weather, or have they any weather to talk about? Do they take a reciprocal interest in us and our proceedings; and have they telescopes of sufficient power to make out the course of the Serpentine, the summit of Primrose Hill, the top of the Duke of York's Column, etc? Do they make mariages de convenance? Do they wear beards? Have they lawyers? Is such a thing as a job known in the upper circles? Are any of the following articles in request among them—ronge, false hair, orders for theaters, fiery sherry, morning calls, quack medicines, high black hats, after-dinner speeches, burlesques, great exhibitions, horse-hair wigs and turtle soup? Do they make Latin verses? Do they learn the dead languages of extinct planets before they are taught their own? Are their railways or airways, or whatever their means of locomotion may be called, as well managed as our own? Have they street music? Have they trouble with their servants? Is the manufacture of umbrellas a flourishing branch of their trade and commerce? Have they a Lord Mayor? Have they a Punch?

— A little girl in Aberdeen, being sent to a dame's school at which the daily prayer contained this petition: "May we live in thy fear and die in thy favor, O Lord!" returned home, and announced to her mother that she could repeat the teacher's prayer, which she thought a very good one. The foregoing petition, however, she had picked up thus (and stuck to it): "May we live in thy fear and die in a fever, O Lord." Happily, up to this date (1873), the little girl, now a worthy matron in Melbourne, lives to tell the story.

St. David's Day.

Wear we the leek to-day in memory of honorable achievements.

Sol once more, with vernal ray,
Gilds auspiciously the day;
Eager we, with glee, to pay
St. David's mite.

Far from Snowdon's lofty peak,
Boldly bear our country's leek;
Ever proudly of it speak,
With faces bright.

Burning with poetic fire,
Harmonize the voice and lyre;
Join the chorus, son and sire,
With all your might.

Fill the page of friendship's roll,
Circulate the wassail bowl,
Saturate each thirsty soul,
To his delight.

Pledge our Patron Saint a toast,
Next to Peter—'mong the host—
David is the master ghost
In realm of sprite.

Patriotic circles band,
Goblets full, in every hand,
Drain to honor fatherland—
No more to fight.

Bloody swords, and wounds to bind,
Never more we there shall find;
Conflicts hence of mind with mind,
To judge aright.

Spite of Romans, Saxons, Danes,
Norman thieves, and English Thanes,
Cambria unencumbered reigns—
Here to-night.

Celts in blood, and yet 'tis seen,
Red our flag—not furtive green—
Loyally we toast the Queen,
God and the right.

The Right Man in the Right Place.

Governor Booth appears to possess the happy faculty of satisfying the public with official appointments. It is the gift pre-eminent to make a successful administration. His judges have in almost every instance been men who were honest and learned, and in the Executive branches of the Government he has, if possible, been even more fortunate. This result has been brought about, we believe, by his determination not to make the faculty for political wire pulling the test of official fitness. His last appointment, that of Lewis Cunningham, to be Harbor Commissioner, vice Marks transferred to other fields of usefulness, is one of the very best he has made, and is in itself a compliment to every decent official and respectable voter and tax-payer in the State. Putting it upon the most selfish ground, it is equivalent to saying to the people that he has confidence that an upright and conscientious discharge of duty is one of the roads—is, indeed, the shortest and most direct road—to political preferment. We have had before now Governors who were candidates for the Senate, more than one, or even two, and it is true that their exercise of the appointing power has in every instance demonstrated their opinions to be to the effect that the people were managed by the worst elements of society, and not by the best. They have shown that they thought their cause advanced by having unscrupulous men in subordinate positions, and so have filled up every branch of the Government with them. We do not know that Governor Booth is a candidate for the Senate. All of his enemies charge that he is, and his friends answer that they hope it is true. But we do say, that if he be a candidate, and the result of his candidacy is to put such men as Mr. Lewis Cunningham in responsible positions, then we say to him, go on being a candidate, for it works well for the people. If the being a candidate for the Senate involves the appointment by the Governor, for the time being, of high-minded and honorable gentlemen to take charge of the property of the State and manage it, of wise and just and poor men to be Supreme Judges, as in our opinion is the case with the incumbent now setting upon that bench by the appointment of the Governor now supposed to be a candidate, we say, then let it be understood that all Governors be candidates for the Senate henceforth and forever, and let them be elected, too, as a reward for their faith in the cause of justice, truth and right.

General vs. Drover.

There was once a Scotch drover who, though he could neither read nor write, had nevertheless made a large fortune by sheep farming, and was open to any degree of flattery as to his abilities in this department of labor. A purchaser, knowing his weakness, and anxious to ingratiate himself into his good graces, ventured one evening over the whiskey-toddy to remark: "I am of the opinion, sir, that you are a greater man than even the Duke of Wellington!" "Hoot, toot!" replied the shepherd, modestly, hanging his head with a pleased smile, and taking a large pinch of snuff, "that's too much—too much by far—by far." But his guest, after expatiating for a while upon the great powers of his host in collecting and concentrating upon a Southern market a flock of sheep, suggested the question: "Could the Duke of Wellington have done that?" The sheep farmer thought a little, snuffed, took a glass of toddy, and replied: "The Duke of Wellington was, no doubt, a clever man; very, very clever, I believe. They tell me he was a good soldier; but then, d'y'e see, he had reasonable men to deal with—captains, and majors, and generals, that could understand him, every one of them, both officers and men; but I'm not sure, after all, if he could manage, say twenty thousand sheep, beside black cattle, that could not understand one word he said, Gaelic or English, and bring every hoof o' them to Fa'kirk Tryst? I doot it—I doot it—but I have done that!" The inference was evident.

"Engineering."

There is no exchange that reaches our table weekly more welcome or more valued by us than the Engineering, a scientific paper published in London, by Messrs. Dredge and Maw, two gentlemen of more than ordinary ability in the journalistic line of business that they for some years past have made a specialty. The articles written by these gentlemen can easily be detected by the thorough, scientific and unanswerable manner in which they are generally presented. Articles connected with the civil and military engineering service are particularly well handled, and the paper frequently contains, in condensed form, an immense mass of information relating to the railway interests of England, India, United States, and other countries. Scientific society matters are carefully reviewed and commented upon. The Engineering is the organ of no party, and although it leans strongly on the side of "narrow gauge," or the new system, it is supported by engineers of all gauges. We honestly recommend the paper to our readers, and trust it will obtain what it merits—a wide and extended circulation on this coast. Immeasurably it is the best practical scientific paper that comes to this coast. In narrow gauge matters the paper is full of practical detail, with illustrations that are works of art. Engineers and mechanics will find a fund of valuable information in the Engineering, that is not to be obtained in any other publication of the kind we know of. It embraces authentic statistics of the railway system of the world, and seemingly publishes nothing that is unreliable. It has done much for the narrow gauge interests, and deserves to be patronized to a large extent in this country by the advocates of that system. The following is the Engineering's—

NOTICE TO AMERICAN SUBSCRIBERS.—In consequence of the great increase in our American connexion, we have found it necessary to establish a branch office in the United States. Communications may in future be addressed to Mr. George Edward Harding, C. E., of 176 Broadway, New York, who is our accredited representative. In answer to numerous inquiries, Mr. Charles Gilbert begs to state that subscribers in the United States can be supplied with Engineering from this office, post free, for the sum of £1 14s. 8d. ($8 32 gold) per annum, payable in advance. 37 Bedford street, Strand, W. C.

Joint Stock Companies.

The following new joint stock companies have been brought forward: The New Gas Company, capital £500,000, in shares of £5, established for the purpose of acquiring and commercially developing the British and foreign patents for improvements in the manufacture of gas for lighting, known as Fusk's patents. The prospectus states that the new gas, although produced from hydrocarbon vapor, differs entirely from air gas, as, instead of common air, a specially prepared gas of a permanent character is employed, which requires far less spirit to give it illuminating power, and possesses the further advantage of being able to travel through pipes without deposit or loss of illuminating power. The gas, both for heating and lighting purposes, the prospectus states to be very superior, and the process applied to gas for lighting has been submitted to rigid tests by competent authorities, who report strongly in its favor. In addition to the patents granted for the United Kingdom, steps have been taken to obtain patents from fifty-three different Governments, and the economy is stated to be such that it is not unreasonable to expect that it will gradually be adopted by existing companies all over the world. By this process, too, it is stated that one man can do as much work as thirty under the present system, and existing gasworks can be readily adapted to the system at moderate cost, while the process can be applied to single houses, churches, manufactories distant from gasworks, with perfect safety at low cost. The vendor is to dispose to the company the whole of his British and foreign patents for £50,000 in cash and £75,000 in shares of the company, together with one-tenth of surplus profits above 25 per cent., and one-tenth of the proceeds of any foreign patents which may be sold for sums in gross.—English paper.

The Age of Fisk.

A civilization of planters and builders, hoeing and hammering in competition and strife. A nation of kleptomaniacs, mad to be rich at any sacrifice. Moral worth drenched as a fanatic, or patronized as a milk sop; every material success worshiped as a god. Trade a corner in grain that starves the poor; a parley of two foxes, each lying for a goose; a game of euchre to set gamblers on edge. In a million of people one Astor, one Stewart, one Vanderbilt, thirty thousand women so cheap that their bodies are on sale, thirty thousand men so cheap as to eat the bread of such earnings. Politics a swill-trough, at which the greediest swine gets soonest fat. The church a fashion-plate. Law a thing that helps a man steal fifty millions of dollars; then, if he leaves two millions behind at death, calls it his own property. Justice so poor a farce that this man's daudly murderer becomes a public benefactor, and his wanton jilt a general blessing. Did I say all this was a nightmare? Yes, the age of Fisk.—E. H. G. Clark, of Troy.

An Excellent Roadway.

The work of macadamizing New Montgomery street, between Mission and Howard, has progressed far enough to show that the road, when finished, will be superior to any other roadway of the kind in the city. The foundation is composed of the ordinary rock taken from the hills, over which is placed nine inches of flint rock, obtained by the contractor, Mr. Caduc, at a quarry about seven miles from the city. This rock appears to be of excellent quality, not liable to turn into mud or ground to dust to be blown away by the wind. It is broken in pieces as large as a man's fist, and rolled hard with an iron roller, a top dressing of the same, crushed very fine, being rolled in to make the road smooth. Those capable of judging pronounce it the only macadamizing worthy of the name yet done here. At the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors, Mr. Caduc was authorized to macadamize Market street from Franklin to Ridley, in the same manner, the contractor agreeing to keep the work in repair one year. In order to perform this and other work of the kind, Mr. Caduc has sent East for a steampower roller, which will have a pressure of 30,000 pounds. The first year of a macadamized street is always the critical period; if not well made of durable material it will be spoiled within that time. The discovery of this new road-making material is one of much importance to San Francisco, where the sandy soil prevents the holding of cobbles, and the climate is unfavorable to the permanency of wooden pavements. The cost of macadamizing is also less, being but eighteen cents per foot, while the expense for repairs is comparatively small. All depressions in the streets during the first year being filled with the flint rock and rolled in, there can be little doubt that a good and permanent roadway will be the result. The great difficulty in macadamizing heretofore has been the want of any suitable material.

— An American adventuress, giving her name as Maria Graindorge, has been arrested in Paris on the following charge of impudent and ingenious swindling: She appears well dressed, and with a handsome baby in her arms, at the houses of wealthy Parisians, asking to see the proprietor. As soon as she was admitted to his presence, she would rush at him, exclaiming, "Traitor! wretch! villain! have I found you at last!" At the same time, the handsome baby, having been trained for that purpose, would extend its little arms toward the astonished gentleman and cry, "Papa, dear papa!" It may be imagined that "papa" preferred to give the swindler some money in order to make her leave the house. When she was arrested at her residence in the Rue Duviivier, no fewer than seven trained babies were found in the house, also nine or ten thousand francs in money. Mlle. Graindorge, upon being closely pressed by the examining magistrate, confessed that her real name was Oaks; that she was a native of New York; and that she had been before at the Saint Lazare prison. The Paris Assizes found her guilty, and she was sent for seven years to New Caledonia.

— The following love epistle was sent by a stone-cutter to a widow: "Divine Flint:—Were you not harder than porphyry, or agate, the chisel of my love, drove by the mallet of my fidelity, would have made some impression on thee. I that have shaped as I pleased, the most untoward substances, hoped by the compass of reason, the plummet of discretion, the saw of constancy, the soft file of kindness, and the polish of good words to have modeled you into one of the prettiest statues in the world; but alas! I find you are a flint, that strikes fire and sets my soul in a blaze, though your heart is as cold as marble. Pity my case, pray madam, for I know not what I say or do. If I go to make a dragon, I strike out a cupid; instead of a church fount for baptism, I make an apothecary's mortar; and dear pillar of my hopes, pedestal of my comfort, and cornice of my joy, take compassion upon me, for upon your pity I build all my hope, and will, if fortunate, erect statues, obelisks, and pyramids to your generosity.

— A good story is being told of Poole, the fashionable tailor in Saville Row, London. One of his aristocratic customers, thinking to annoy him, went up to him as he was walking on the Parade at Brighton at the most fashionable hour of the day, and said to him, "See, Poole, how badly this coat fits." The great Sartor was fully equal to the occasion. Taking a piece of chalk out of his pocket, he marked sundry hieroglyphics over the puppy's back, and then, turning him adrift, said, "There, my lord, you go and show yourself to my people, and they will soon put you right." The general impression was that Lord Blank did not win that game at Poole.

— A certain Moses Cohen attempted suicide off Meliggs' Wharf. He was a considerable young man, for before he took the fatal plunge, he carefully divested himself of his coat, money and watch. This was very knowing of him. No doubt he thought the water would stop his watch and soil his coat, and that he would not be able to see what time it was when he woke. We don't think he meant biz, or he would have taken the lot with him. Few Moses's of our acquaintance would leave a watch, coat and money unless they meant to call for it again.

Off the Coast.

"The sea is quiet, my oarsman,
So let us idly float
In the hush of this glorious silence,
From turmoil and life remote;
The past, like the shore behind us,
Marking how little we've gained;
The future, the blue beyond us,
Boundless and unattained.

"But, love, remember I'm mortal,
Satisfied quite to know
That deep in your heart, my opal,
Is prisoned love's fadeless glow.
So I shall watch this sunlight
Tangle itself in your curls,
And light up the gems on your finger
The pallid shimmer of pearls.

"Stay; in my brain a poem
Hums, with a rhythmic flow
Quaint as its words, and tender
As love was ages ago.
Bend your head and listen
Clear to its happy cress,
As you might watch a rosebud
Bursting into a rose.

"The sunbeams shake in sparkles
From a hand that is fair to see.
No lay of ancient minstrel
Shall interpret love for me;
For labor is her handmaid,
And vain in the tropic thought
Of your poet you search for blessings
That loving service has wrought.

"Well, since you choose mistake me,
Silent my heart shall sing;
Though every pulse is thrilling
Like a bird's at breath of Spring;
For the love my lay interprete
Lingers in your eyes,
And all my life shall teach you
Its song of sacrifice."

"The Galaxy" Club-Room—Professional Metaphors.—Lord Bacon says, "Every man is a debtor to his profession," and most men show their obligation to their peculiar calling by clothing their thoughts in technical language.

There's nothing like leather, says the shoemaker, and in every station of society we find the same appreciation of one's specialty. Every person who writes a book thinks his subject the most engrossing.

"Have you read my 'Commentary on the Book of Job'?" said Dr. Orton to a friend. "I have looked into it a little."

"Is that the way you treat a book that has cost me years of severe labor?"

"Because you have deemed it your duty to spend years in writing a book, I do not consider it mine to spend an equal time in reading it."

This frank and fearless reply is quite excusable, as the worthy Doctor's exegesis filled five folio volumes.

Every reformer thinks his field of labor or his theme a matter of vital importance to the community; in fact, this feeling is universal, from diplomatist to dressmaker. Johnson met a fellow in an ale-house who always called himself "the great Twalmly, inventor of the flood-gate iron for smoothing linen." This intense interest often merges in the idea of possession. "L'état, c'est moi," said Louis XIV., snapping his whip upon his boot. With spiritual rulers it is the same. Many a good pastor regards his flock as much his property as does the farmer his sheep grazing on the hill-side. Authority over a number is apt to give undue prominence to that little word meum. Patriotism is often this and nothing more. The late Lord Lytton exemplifies this when he tells us that the Englishman exults that so great a country belongs to himself.

"It is my wife whom you shall not insult; it is my house that you shall not enter; and by a species of ultra-mundane appropriation, it is my God whom you shall not blaspheme."

Earnest devotion to one occupation colors language to such a degree that we can say of many a one, as of Peter of old, "Thy speech bewrayeth thee." The human mind is so constituted that it excels in only one thing. Universal geniuses like Aristotle, Humboldt and Goethe are the rare exceptions. Hence the tendency to run in grooves or narrow ruts, and the subject nearest the heart naturally mounts to the lips. In social gatherings of professional men the conversation inevitably smacks of the shop. Ministers chuckle over the sharp sallies of their clerical brethren, lawyers retail the repartees of the bar, and doctors, who are proverbially an anecdotal class of men, draw their side-splitting stories from curious scenes of sick-room or dissecting table. Old graduates when they meet talk with renewed youth of college scrapes and escapades; teachers, from the monotony of their lives, often get so deep into their rut that they can't look over it into the big, busy world, and are in danger of becoming pedantic prosers.

Shakespeare, Scott, Shenstone, Goldsmith, Dickens and Irving have all caricatured this peculiarity of the pedagogue; and Holofernes, Dominie Sampson and Ichabod Crane are doubtless but highly colored photographs of really existing characters.

The professional robber even, when talking with his pal, uses a series of slang phrases that constitute a dialect; and by a strange association of ideas I am reminded of the jargon of the Gold Room and the patois of the Wall street broker—an unintelligible Babel to those outside the ring. This is true of every class in life to a greater or less degree, and a collection of these similes may be amusing. During the late rebellion many people were raised from humble positions to places of important trust. A stage driver of fine personal appearance became a paymaster. He was extremely reticent, and the officers of the regiment were puzzled to find out his social position. He was at last invited to mess with them, and the surgeon, happening to know a distinguished gentleman of the town from whence he came, attempted to draw out their new acquaintance by discoursing on this individual. After listening to the high commendation of his townsman, his only but very significant remark was: "Yes, sir, he's a smooth-rolling coach." No more need of mental corkscrews; the secret was out.

An innkeeper once, speaking of a neighbor whom he seemed not to esteem very highly, remarked, "He won't bear much of a bead anyhow." The bead that rose to the surface of the liquor in the decanters need to be considered a test of its strength. I have heard elderly people say that workmen were accustomed to test their rations of rum by shaking the bottle to see if it would bear a bead. When watered, this was wanting. And a man who had been for years in California during the mining excitement, thus described a shiftless, ne'er-do-weel companion: "I've panned him out over and over again, but can't find any color."

A banker signed his letters to his friends "Yours at sight," and a lawyer advised a young man to close his billet-doux to Araminta with the words "Yours without prejudice," thereby avoiding the annoyance of a breach of promise suit. It is reported of Lord John Russell that in the multiplicity of his parliamentary duties he would forget the names of his children, and refer to them under the heads of Schedule A and Schedule B, etc. I knew an apothecary who put a leaf in his hat at a large party just as "a symptom" by which he might recover it.

The sailor must not be omitted, for his use of nautical metaphors is proverbial; indeed, he would find it hard to talk in any other way. I remember one verse of a poem called "The Sailor Ashore." He sees a man covering a roof with tin, and the mirth of the jolly tar is roused:

"Shipmate ahoy!" the sailor cried;
"It makes a fellow grin
To see you copper-bottoming
Your upper decks with tin."

"Can't we ride, too?" said some roguish fellows to a sailor who in his delight at getting on land again had hired a handsome carriage for a drive solus. "As many as wants to can crowd into the hold, but I rides on deck," was the good-natured reply.

Terrible jokes have been made about mothers-in-law, but who ever heard anything worse than the project of the veterinary surgeon to founder his by dancing with her until she was thoroughly heated, and then giving her all the iced lemonade she could drink!

But I have saved the most remarkable metaphor for a climax. In some newly settled western territory, from which the boy wrote to his father to come right out and join him, "because almighty mean men get office here," a jockey was promoted to a judgeship, and on the occasion of his taking his seat made the following address to the jury: "If this court know her duty, and she thinks she do, justice will walk over this track head and tail up!"

Dickens, who was always true to nature, often used professional metaphors with great effect. What can come in better just here than old Weller's announcement to Sam of the sudden demise of his mother-in-law:

"Her veels was immediately greased and everythink done to set her agoin as could be invented. Your farther had hopes as she vould have vorked round as usual, but just as she was a turnin' the corner, my boy, she took the wrong road and vent down hill vith a velocity you never see, and notwithstanding that the drag was put on directly by the medikel man, it wornt of no use at all, for she paid the last pike at twenty minutes afore six yesterday evenin, havin done the journey very much under the reglar time."

The enthusiasm for one's particular pursuit, which leads to this technical use of words, is commented upon by Sir Philip Sidney in his "Defence of Poesie." When learning horsemanship at the Emperor's court, his teacher, an esquire of the stable, "exercised his speech in praise of his faculty. He said soldiers were the noblest of mankind, and horsemen were the noblest soldiers. He said they were the masters of war and the ornaments of peace; speedy goers and strong abiders; triumphers both in camp and courts; nay, to so unbelieving a point he proceeded, as that no earthly thing bred so much wonder to a prince as to be a good horseman; skill in government was but pedanteria in comparison. Then would he add certain praises by telling what a peerless beast the horse was; the only serviceable courtier without flattery; the beast of most beauty, faithfulness and courage; and such more, that if I had not been a piece of a logician before I came to him, I think he would have persuaded me to have wished myself a horse. But thus much, with his no few words, he drove into me: that self-love is better than any gliding to make that seem gorgeous wherein ourselves are parties."

It is a terrible come-down, but speaking of horses, you should hear the inimitable vender of the cough lozenge on the Jersey ferry-boat pouring forth unqualified praise of that nauseous mixture of ipecac, cubebs and licorice, moistened with molasses, with an enthusiasm fully equal to Sidney's squire.
